> shall, on conviction thereof by a court of summary jurisdiction or on indictment as hereinafter mentioned, be liable either to pay a penalty not exceeding £20 or to be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three months with or without hard labor.

Now, the change in the legislation of Great Britain which the Senator from New Jersey lauds so much is subject to all those restrictions which I have quoted from the act of Parliament of 1875. There was an amendatory act passed in December, 1906, but it does not modify any of the provisions I have indicated. The only modification in it is that it authorizes peaceful picketing. So while on the one hand, if the Senator will allow me—and I speak by his permission—the British trade-union act seems to be a great deal more liberal than our legislation here is, yet on the other hand it is subject to a class of restrictions that are not found in our statute books, and that would be found very burdensome and onerous to labor in this country.

Mr. HUGHES. I will simply say that British workmen have found the trade-dispute act recently enacted eminently satisfactory. It has enabled them to do what the laboring men of America want to be enabled to do, to preserve and keep their organizations, to withdraw simultaneously from employment, and to do the usual things, subject always to the law of the community in which they are done, during the periods when strikes are on or declared.

Mr. NELSON. But did the Senator observe section 5 of the British act, to which I called attention and which I read?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes; I observed it, and I simply want to call the Senator's attention to this——

Mr. NELSON. What has the Senator to say to that? Does he approve that provision or is he against it?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not recollect the provision.

Mr. NELSON. I will read it again.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not care to have it read to me now.

Mr. NELSON. I should like to know how the Senator stands on that question. Would he like to have such a provision incorporated into our law, or is he opposed to it?

Mr. HUGHES. I should like to have a law as good as the British trade-dispute act; yes; and I know the Senator would not vote for such an act.

Mr. NELSON. I will quote it again, with the Senator's permission.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not want the Senator to read it again.

Mr. NELSON. No; I do not suppose the Senator does.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator can put it in the RECORD if he likes. I am so indifferent to it that I will let the Senator put me down as being either for it or against it; he can use his own judgment.

I know this: I know that the British Parliament rose at once to the emergency when it saw the difficult situation into which the labor organizations of England had drifted. They had friends in the Parliament, and the friends enacted the legislation they asked, and under that legislation there has not been a single case such as littered the calendars of the courts before. I know that. I know that the question was settled. I should like to have the Senator help me settle it in this country.

American workmen are entitled to as good treatment as British workmen or the workmen of any other country. They do not get it. The legislation in this country is less favorable to workmen than that of any other civilized country in the world, and the Senator knows it, and has helped to keep it as it is.

I have said a good deal more than I intended to say, Mr. President. I think this is a tardy compliance with the just and reasonable demands of the laboring people of this country. In my judgment, there is nothing in this section which justifies the secondary boycott or a boycott of any kind. It simply makes legal that which we all have been taught to believe was legal. It simply interposes the barrier of the arm of this law before an unfriendly Attorney General, who might with great reason and force, it seems to me, go into a court of equity and dissolve by injunction every organization of railroad trainmen, firemen, or engineers who were organized for the purpose of simultaneously ceasing their employment whenever necessary to enforce their demands. That is all it does, in my opinion.

It is possible that at a later time I may have something to say with reference to the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have been somewhat surprised at some of the views which the Senator from New Jersey expressed, although I agree perfectly with his closing sentence. I think the labor organizations of this country ought to have the right which the Senator says he thinks they ought to have, if we are to measure that right according to his closing paragraph; but there were some views expressed during his able and earnest presentation of this matter that I do not entirely accept.

He eulogizes the British trades act. There are some things in the British trades act which may be commendatory, and which, in so far as our framework of government would admit, might be very properly transmitted to this country. But when the Senator goes further and says that the legislative condition and the general condition of labor in Great Britain are better than in America, I am sure the Senator in his zeal has overstepped the actual facts.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I do not think I said that, and I did not intend to say it. I said that simply from a legislative standpoint there had been more legislation enacted for the benefit of English workmen than had been enacted for the benefit of American workmen. I want to make that absolutely clear. If there is any doubt about it, I will call the Senator's attention to the pension laws that have been enacted and various other social measures.

Mr. BORAH. I am aware that there are some things that, as I say, are commendatory; but if the weather should turn cool before this debate closes I propose to present the condition of legislation in England with reference to labor and the condition of labor in England with reference to the condition of labor in America, because it will be a startling contrast, not a comparison but a contrast, altogether to the advantage of the workmen of America, of which we ought to be very glad. Labor is not so well paid, not so well housed, not so well clothed, not so well governed as in America.

But that is no reason, Mr. President, why we should not go forward and do whatever is right and proper to be done for the laboring men of this country. I repeat, as I said yesterday, that in so far as it is necessary to protect union labor to go forward and do the things which ordinarily and legitimately any reasonable man would say belongs to union labor to do, I am in favor of going that distance. In fact, Mr. President, I believe I may say, speaking in a general way, that I could go all the way with labor on the hither side of threats and intimidation and violence. I do not believe that there is anything on the hither side of these that I would not be willing to do for laboring men and to enable them to do so far as the Federal Government has power to legislate on the subject. I would protect fully and completely their right to organize, their right to strike, and their right to enforce the strike in all peaceful and lawful ways.

Now, just a word with reference to the protective tariff, which was brought into this matter. He assails the Republican Party most severely and denounces it for legislating for the rich as against the poor, of building up monopoly against the rights and at the cost of labor. It may be that the protective tariff has not been the benefit to the laboring men of this country which men during the campaign assured them that it would be. It may be that their share of the profits have not drifted down to them, and that they have not had their proportion of the world's blessings and comforts. I believe that that is true. I do not believe that labor has had its fair proportion of our prosperity in past years. But, Mr. President, to-day there is estimated to be by laboring men themselves at least 500,000, if not a million, men out of employment. What has brought that condition about I am not going into details at this time to say, but it is the honest, the solemn judgment and conviction of the advocates of a protective tariff that it would assist in ameliorating that condition if it were restored in a uniform way in this country. I may be in error in regard to that, but those who believe in the other policy have not been able to find employment for the 500,000 or million of men who are out of employment in this country to-day. Neither have they by their system of spotted free trade reduced the cost of living to those who have employment, to say nothing of the condition of those out of employment.

But, Mr. President, what is the protective tariff? When does it take and when does it not take? When does it apply and when does it not apply? If there is any particular form of a protective policy found in this country that is peculiarly offensive to Democracy it is in regard to the coastwise shipping in the United States. You have denounced it on every stump and filled the debates here with anathemas. If there is any form of protective policy which has been designated, individualized, and legalized and made a monopoly, it is the coastwise shipping proposition which we had before us a few days ago in this Senate Chamber.

Last Friday when we adjourned and that matter was before the Senate there was scarcely a quorum to be found in Washington, and the lack of interest and apathy upon the part of legislators was phenominal. But the legislation having been postponed from Friday until Monday, practically every Senator of the United States was then in his seat, and the forces and the influence which have sustained this form of protection in this country in its most aggravated and indefensible form were in Washington before Monday morning's sun had risen. And the party always denouncing this monopoly, this form of protection, retreated from their report and from the report of their party and perpetuated further the most offensive form of monopoly that protection could possibly foster in this country, as our Democratic friends view it.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KERN. I was about to say—

> Thou canst not say I did it; never shake
> Thy gory locks at me.

Mr. BORAH. That is true; and I could say more than that in compliment to the Senator. I am far from criticizing his course on this or other things.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. Supplementing what our distinguished leader the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] has said, I wish to say also that I claim to be one who has stood by the true Democratic doctrine and stood by the report of that conference committee and voted last Friday as I voted on the 11th of June upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to permit all ships to enter our coastwise trade.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was not looking at the Senator from Indiana or the Senator from Arizona. I will confine my "looks" now entirely to this side of the Chamber in order that I may not be supposed to criticize anyone, in person or in particular.

Now, Mr. President, I believe in a protective policy and in the principle of protection. I do not believe in its application in spots or in sections. I do not believe in protecting shipbuilding and protecting peanuts in the State of Virginia and in putting wheat and barley upon the free list. It is but a question of applying the principle. If it is applied with universal effect, so that it may reach Nation wide, building up industries, energizing labor, affording opportunity and inducing initiative, it is a great system. If it is not thus applied, it becomes a special privilege, and is intolerable and indefensible.

Mr. President, a word with reference to the limitation on the sundry civil bill to which the Senator from New Jersey [Mr.

HUGHES] referred. He said it was put into the bill for the purpose of testing the sense of the House—a Republican House—and that when it was brought over here it had served its purpose. But the Senator from New Jersey, in a very earnest speech upon this floor, advocated its passage through the Senate for the same reason, I presume, that he urged its passage through the House—not to test the sense of the Senate and not to test the sense of the House, but because he said that the great organization of which he was a humble member was now prepared to do justice to the laboring men, who had been so long delayed in securing the justice to which they were entitled.

I took occasion to say upon the floor of the Senate at that time that attaching that limitation to that bill was a piece of hypocrisy and a fraud. I read in Mr. Gompers's great association paper within six months thereafter that it was a fraud, that the prosecutions wherever they arose proceeded just the same, that the law was enforced just the same, and that while they had asked for bread they had been given a stone.

Furthermore, Mr. President, the Senator tells us that certain Members of the House, as I understood, after serving the Manufacturers' Association and doing their work on the floor of the House, were selected out and put upon the Federal bench for the purpose apparently of protecting the manufacturers and the monopolies of this country. It was a serious charge to make. It was a direct impeachment of the honor of a Republican President and a most serious assault upon the bench. If any man has been placed upon the Federal bench for that purpose and there is any proof of that fact, it is not too late yet to know whether or not he is serving his masters who placed him there, and it should be investigated. I hope the Senator, in the cause of good and decent government, will withhold no fact.

But again, Mr. President, if the Senator wants to raise the question of serving monopolies, and of the close relationship between political parties and the interests, and selecting men who represent the monopolies to go into high place, what is the difference between selecting some single individual from the House of Representatives to go upon the Federal bench, where he is checked up by other judges and his opinions supervised and reviewed by the great Supreme Court of the United States, and selecting as the representative of one of the condemned monopolies of this country a man who had helped to build it up and defend it to take charge of the currency of the country, which indeed is no less than the lifeblood of the Nation? Does the Senator think that his party in these days is in a position to boast or to flaunt the record of anyone?

Give me the power to control the currency of this country, to contract and to inflate the currency, and I do not care who renders your decisions; I will build my fortune so high and spread my influence so far that no petty Federal judge can reach my power.

I would rather if I were seeking power and wanted to have close and effective alliance between government and monopoly to have control of the Federal Reserve Board than any single place in the whole structure of government. I am not impeaching the action of anyone, but it requires some effrontery, in view of lately written history, for Democracy to be talking of close alliance with the "interests."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is a common, and, I think, a deplorably common thing in these days to be always assailing the courts. I do not sympathize with this wholesale assault.

I do not claim that the courts do not err; they sometimes err signally and pronouncedly. I do not claim that they always administer justice with an even and exact hand, for judges are human and the passions and prejudices, the limited vision and the clouded mind which sometimes attach to their kind are also theirs. I do not claim that they are always free from political bias or at all times wholly exempt from that strange attachment which in a republic sometimes places party above the common welfare, for Presidents and governors and electorates in selecting judges do not always seek men most likely to resist such influences. But I do claim that of all the methods and contrivances and schemes which have been devised by the wit of man for the adjustment of controverted judicial questions and the administration of justice the courts and the machinery of the courts, built up from decade to decade and from century to century, built of the experience and the wisdom of a proud and freedom-loving race, the courts as they are built into our system, though not perfect, are the most perfect. They will not always be abreast of the most advanced opinions in the march of progress, but that they will in due time mortise and build into our jurisprudence all that is permanent and wise and just, all that a settled and digested public opinion finally indorses, no one familiar with the history of our jurisprudence can for a moment doubt. Not only that, but more than once the courts, both in England and America, have stood as the sole protector in the hour of turmoil and strife for the rights of the weak and the poor, the oppressed and the hunted, when the executive and the legislature have yielded to the whip of the strong and the powerful. I need recall only one instance in the hurry of this debate, though I might recall a hundred, beginning with the days of Coke's courage, and that is the instance wherein our own great Supreme Court preserved against the encroachments of war and the hunger of hatred the right of trial by jury, a most sacred right of the American citizen and without which the whole scheme of a republic would be but a delusion and a torment.

After the courts then what? When the courts can no longer stay the steps which may lead to violence and bloodshed, then what? When the arm of equity can no longer be extended to hold things in abeyance until rights can be adjudicated and reason and counsel can have a hearing, then what? Be not deceived. The alternative is the soldier and the bayonet. One can not be oblivious to the alacrity with which wealth in these days is prone to appeal to the soldier. When a delegation of workingmen informed me a few months ago that their fellow workmen had been arrested without warrant, tried without a jury, sentenced by no court—that at a time when the courts were open and in the midst of an intelligent, prosperous, modern American community men had been herded before a military tribunal, given the semblance of a trial, and sent to prison, it seemed incredible. For nearly 600 years no such repulsive scene had marred the story of the orderly development and growth of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence. Our English ancestors had executed the petty tyrants who had last attempted it. I did not suppose that here, where jury trials and common-law courts were a guaranty—a part of our system of law and justice—that anyone would be so blind, so cruel, so witless as to covet the infamy of rehabilitating that discarded and detested dogma—the power of suspension. Nevertheless it was true. Since that time, in three other States, the workingman has settled his troubles out of court where counsel may be heard and witnesses testify, settled them at the point of the bayonet. What a glutton arbitrary power is for the rights and the interests of the weak. It generally comes forward at the bidding of the rich and the powerful and preys upon the interests and rights of the poor and the helpless.

These men who came to me were asking for what? They were asking for a hearing in the courts, before this tribunal, whose judgments they informed me they were willing to take. They were praying for the common-law court and its machinery just as it had been worked out and fought for in the humble days of our English ancestors to the humble days of their descendants on Paint and Cabin Creek in one of the great Commonwealths of this Union. And what was the answer to the charge when we arrived upon the ground? When we asked why have these men charged with offenses under the statute and guaranteed a trial in a common-law court been denied the right of the humblest citizen when charged with crime, what was the answer? The answer was not that riot and war had closed the courts, but that excitement and feeling in the community would render them ineffective in all probability. When we inquired further, the fear was that these laboring men would likely be acquitted. What, before the courts, acquitted under the processes and according to the manner that guilty men have been punished and innocent men acquitted for ten centuries? Then they must be innocent. But the logic seemed to be that, guilty or innocent, they must be punished. Force must be established and certainty as to results must be had. So, the strong fled from the courts of justice, suspended—what an infamous lie—yes, suspended by force the constitution of the State and the Nation, selected a military tribunal, called the judges from the guards who were in charge of the prisoners, tried them in groups, and sent them in droves to the penitentiary. Do not the workingmen understand that in the end their fight will be to maintain these courts in all their purity, independence, and strength? Do they not understand that if we can not have somewhere an independent tribunal, free from the passions and conflicts of contestants, to distribute justice, civilization must do again what it has done in the past—crumble and fall? Does not the average citizen of this country, whoever and wherever he is, understand that in the end he must find justice here in these tribunals or not find it at all? Does he not understand that after they are gone and law and order have departed he will shortly come to be the victim of violence and cruelty and injustice, the plaything of arbitrary power?

There comes a time, Mr. President, when every man and when the people in every walk of life seek shelter under the calm, determined, beneficent power of a great government, rely upon its impartial strength, and accept with gratitude its means and methods of measuring and distributing justice. Men should seek to build a government which has no classes, grants no special privileges, recognizes no creed, and fosters no religion. It is a blind and shortsighted policy to suppose that you can curtail the functions of government in order to bestow favors, for when you have done so you have already weakened government for the prevention of wrongs. The fruits of industry, the wages of the toiler, the income of capital are all affected, fostered, encouraged, and sustained to the extent that order and law obtain throughout the land. While a strong and fearless government may sometimes seem quick to prevent those steps and block those paths which seem to lead to violence and bloodshed, yet ultimately the benefits to flow from such procedure must redound to the peace and happiness, the contentment and prosperity of the whole people. It was Liebknecht, the great socialist, who truly said, "Violence has been for thousands of years a reactionary factor." Show me a country without courts fully equipped in every way to deal with all the intricacies of each particular case as the facts appear; show me a country with its business and industry under the clamp of bureaucracy, its courts weakened, cowardly, and powerless, and I will show you a country where the laborer is no better than a slave—the miserable, ignorant, unclad dupe and plaything of arbitrary power.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 16, after the word "from," strike out the word "lawfully."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this may be as appropriate a time as any other to express some views I hold with regard to the subject embodied in this seventh section.

I am not satisfied with the legislative expression found in the section now under consideration, but before I point out wherein I believe it might be strengthened and bettered I desire to pay some attention to the remarks of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and other Senators who have viewed the matter from his standpoint. He assailed this legislation, and many eminent citizens have assailed it, because it is alleged that it is class legislation, because it is said that we are here permitting certain people to do an act which if done by others would constitute a violation of the law.

I am not myself opposed to class legislation. Three-fourths of all the legislation adopted by Congress is class legislation. It is necessarily so because a general law will not accomplish the purpose that Congress has in view. But this particular legislation does not fall within the objection.

We have a statute which prohibits and makes unlawful restraints of trade. I agree with the Senator from North Dakota that a restraint of trade is as objectionable if brought about by a labor union as though brought about by a monopoly. But it is not always true that an interference with commerce on the part of a labor union is a restraint of trade.

I intend presently to ask the attention of the Senate to some observations with regard to the law of the matter, but just now I bespeak your consideration for one phase of this subject that hitherto has not been touched upon.

Labor organizations brought together for the purpose of enhancing or advancing wages, bettering the conditions of labor or lessening the hours of labor, can not in the very nature of things be a restraint of trade or commerce. Mark you, I am not now considering what the individual members of a labor organization may do. I am not considering how they may impede commerce in the execution of the objects of their organization. I am simply suggesting that an organization of workingmen who associate themselves together for the purpose of lifting up the plane upon which they live and labor can not be a restraint of trade.

I wonder if it is constantly in our mind that labor, even in a country as fortunate as our own, does not receive a compensation that will enable those who work for wages to adequately discharge their duties as citizens. We have in this country 20,000,000 people who may be called wageworkers. I have no information and can get none with regard to the average compensation of these 20,000,000 wageworkers, but I have information concerning a portion of them which I desire that Senators shall hear and remember during the remaining part of this debate. In the census of 1910 those who were collecting the information investigated the manufacturing establishments of the United States as defined in the law providing for the Thirteenth Census. I want, first, to read what the word "establishment" means, in order to show the scope of the investigation:

> The word "establishment," as used in the Thirteenth Census, is defined as meaning one or more factories, mills, or plants owned, controlled, or operated by a person, partnership, corporation, or other owner located in the same town or city, and for which one set of books of account is kept.

In these establishments turning out a product of $500 or more there was an investigation made, and they numbered, in all, 268,491. In these 268,491 establishments there were employed an annual average of 6,615,046 men and women.

I have just stated the average number employed in these establishments during the year 1909. These employees or wageworkers were paid, and I am confining my remarks now to wageworkers exclusive of clerks and salaried officers. The amount paid to these 6,000,000 and more wageworkers during the year 1909 was $3,427,038,000. So the average amount received by each of these 6,000,000 of wageworkers in the establishments to which I have referred was $518 per year. If I could have gathered the information respecting the 20,000,000 comprising all the wageworkers of the United States, I venture to say the average received by all of them would be under rather than over the sum I have mentioned. So we are expecting these 20,000,000 of men and women who constitute the bone, the sinew, the strength of the Republic to live; we are expecting them to support families and educate their boys and girls and train them into good citizens, to feed and clothe them, so that they may be respected members of society, upon $518 per year.

If this be true of the most fortunate Nation on the face of the earth, where opportunity is wider, where the rewards of enterprise and energy are richer than in any other country in all the world, I ask the question of those who seem to doubt the wisdom or the propriety of aiding these working people in enlarging their compensation and in bettering the conditions of their labor if they do not know that the life and the safety of the country depend upon the enlargement of the opportunities and the increase of the wages of our working men and women? Do you not know that unless we are able in some way to put into their hands as compensation for their labor a sum sufficient to inspire hope in their hearts and ambition in their souls, to enable them to hold their confidence in their country's institutions and their hope in the future, the experiment which we have been so brilliantly trying in the last century is doomed to dismal failure? These 20,000,000 of working men and women must be hopeful; they must be intelligent; they must be virtuous; they must be honest; they must be ambitious for themselves and their families, if free institutions in the world are to survive.

Then, why should not these workingmen and working women combine, associate themselves together, in order that their wages may be increased and the conditions under which their labor is performed may be bettered? There is no danger, Mr. President, that the workingman or the working woman will ever receive more than an adequate compensation for the labor performed. There is a potential competition always confronting wageworkers that will inevitably reduce the compensation far below the point at which it should in equity and in good conscience rest. These men and women grow hungry, and they must eat; they must clothe themselves; they must support their families; and these necessities compel them to work at whatsoever wages they may be able to secure. Idleness for any great length of time and among any great proportion of them is absolutely unthinkable and impossible.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I have never been one of those who have had any fear of combination among wageworkers. I believe that it ought to be the policy of this Government to encourage such combination and association. I believe we ought to lend a helping hand to their efforts to advance their condition in life, knowing that with all their energy and with all the assistance we can give them they will never be advanced in fortune or in property beyond the point necessary for comfort and happiness.

This is the beginning, I think, of all consideration of this subject. I do not see how anyone can investigate it without first learning and pondering upon the facts that I have so meagerly stated.

Let us take the next step. We have been debating this bill, and I have heard the subject debated a thousand times upon the hypothesis that the labor of a human being is of the same quality and order as a bale of cotton, a barrel of flour or a bushel of corn. I repudiate the parallel and the comparison. It is because we have been in the habit of thinking of labor as a commodity that we have fallen into many mistakes which now impair and mar, I think, both legislation and judicial opinion. The labor of a human being, whether it be of the mind or of the hand, is not a commodity. While we are in the habit I know, of saying that a workingman has nothing to sell but his labor it is a confusion in thought and in terms. Labor is not a commodity; it is not an article of commerce; and when the Constitution of the United States gave to Congress the authority to regulate commerce among the States, it did not give it the right to regulate labor, the disposition of the energy of the human being.

If we would begin as we ought to begin, with the understanding that the power of a human being to work, to produce something, is not a commodity or a subject of commerce, we would reach a saner and better conclusion than we have heretofore announced.

It may be said that the distinction that I have drawn is technical rather than substantial. Not so, because out of it grows this proposition which is now admitted everywhere, which was declared in the Senate yesterday without dispute, namely, that it is the right of a human being to work or to refrain from working, as he deems best. Under our form of government it is not a thing that can be or ought to be controlled by the law. We have a right to say that one who refuses to work, and in that way becomes a burden upon society, shall no longer be a member of that society; we have a right to expel him from society; but we have no right under our form of government to say that he shall work; we have no right to say for whom he shall work or the vocation in which he may choose to employ his power of body or of mind. There is no inconvenience to organized society brought about by the refusal of a man or of a woman to work which can override the inherent and fundamental right to refuse to work or to refuse to work at a particular employment for a particular compensation or for a particular employer.

Therefore, when we speak of a restraint of trade or of commerce, when we prohibit, as we did in 1890, any person or any combination of persons from restraining trade or commerce, we did not prohibit one man alone, a thousand, or a million men from refraining from work, and we did not and we could not make it a crime for that one man or a thousand men in concert to advise or persuade other men to refrain from work.

Why, Senators, there is a propaganda going on all the time, and has been for years in this country and every other, for a complete change in the form of government. It might just as well be alleged that the movement for socialism is a restraint of trade and commerce as it is to allege that a strike or that the persuasion on the part of strikers brought to bear on those who are still at work to cease to work is a restraint of trade or commerce. After all, it is the privilege of free speech, it is the privilege of carrying forward a movement respecting the rules of society—respecting the belief of individual members of society; and I have never been able to understand how any man could believe that a labor union, the purposes of which are to advance the standard of wages, lessen the hours of employment, or better the conditions under which labor is performed, is a violation of the antitrust law.

But there are a great many people in the country who do believe it is a violation of the antitrust laws, precisely as it would be a violation of the law if a hundred manufacturers were to come together and agree that their products should be sold at a common price without any rivalry or competition between them. A combination or contract of that sort would be a violation of the antitrust law before a single act was performed, save the mere execution of the contract itself. That contract has to do with commodities, with the subjects of commerce, with articles that are transported from place to place and bought and sold in the markets of the world. A contract or an arrangement between men who have nothing to give but themselves, nothing to employ except the power of their own bodies or of their minds which they have, and which they can give or refuse as they choose, such a contract or arrangement as that, as it has always seemed to me and as I believe the better opinion of the courts is, can not be adjudged to be a restraint of trade.

For that reason I repudiate entirely the argument that we are here segregating a class, and exempting that class from the operation of the law and permitting its members to do the very things which other members of society are not permitted to do. That is not true; and if it had not been for the ill-considered judgment of some courts, if it had not been for the hasty and ill-advised expression of some judges, the matter contained in section 7 could never have been brought to the attention of Congress.

There never has been a decision—I emphasize the word "decision"—by any court that a labor union for the purpose I have so often described is in and of itself a violation of the law, or, in other words, a restraint of trade or commerce. There has been much argument that such a union ought to be considered as a violation of the antitrust law, but I think I speak advisedly when I say that no court has ever decided that such a union is within the prohibition of the antitrust law—I mean, now dissociated from any act performed either in the collective capacity of the union or by individual members of the union.

It is, however, as it seems to me, fair and just, in view of the disputes that have arisen from time to time and the differences of opinion which are everywhere manifest, to make it perfectly clear not by exempting a class and saying that we will not hold that class responsible for a violation of law, but by giving a legislative interpretation or construction of the law, by declaring, as we ought to declare, that labor is not a commodity, and that associations of laboring men for the purpose of lifting the level of their lives and increasing their compensation and other things that make existence a little more tolerable do not constitute a restraint of trade. We are not excepting them; we are simply declaring, so that all men may understand, so that hereafter there may be no difference with respect to it, that these unions thus organized are not restraints of trade. We ought to have done it long ago and preserved this country from many a disastrous and irritating controversy.

I have spoken about the right of the employee, the wage earner, to work for whomsoever he pleases or not to work at all. On the other hand, the right of the employer is corelative. The employer has a perfect right to hire whomsoever he pleases or to hire no one. His right in that respect, so far as labor is concerned, is just as well intrenched in the law and in the civilization of the time as is the right of the employee. We can not compel an employer—I am now passing over the question of public corporations which have assumed a duty under the law to the public—but in ordinary industry we can not compel an employer to employ men; we can not compel him to continue his business, to continue the risk of the capital he has invested or the operations which have been theretofore a part of his business; and his refusal to employ men or women can not constitute a restraint of trade.

If we are to recognize this higher right of labor to be dealt with in the manner I have already described, the question then always is—and we might as well look at it plainly and courageously—not whether labor organizations may be brought together for the purpose of general improvement, but what may the members of the associations lawfully do in order to accomplish their purposes?

There has never been any serious dispute hitherto with regard to the mere existence of a labor union, but there has been a very wide range of dispute with regard to what the members of the union can properly do in order to make effectual the purposes of the union, and the whole war has gathered around that issue. Let us see. If it be taken for granted that my view of labor is the correct view and that men may strike or quit their employment when they please, singly or in concert, and that they may persuade other laboring men to quit employment, singly or in concert, the next question—and it is the most difficult and perplexing question of all—is, What may these employees who choose thus to exercise their unquestioned right fairly do in persuading those whom their former employer desires to substitute in their places to refrain from working?

I believe that nine-tenths of all the cases and the overwhelming proportion of all the trouble that has arisen has arisen in the attempt to draw that line; that is, to determine the extent to which the strikers may go in interfering with the admitted right of the employer to substitute other wageworkers in the stead of those who have quit his employment.

The second question, which is of equal difficulty, is, How far may the employees who have thus quit employment go in interfering with the business of their employer; that is, with the sale and distribution of the commodities or articles produced by their employer?

These are the two things that are material in this bill. All that part of the bill which relates to the strike, which relates to the organization itself, is simply the expression of a universal understanding of the subject; but when we come to determine just how far the strikers may go in order to render their cause successful or their strike effectual we meet a difficulty that is not easy of solution.

This particular section does not deal with that question at all. There is a section in the bill, however, which does deal with it; and when the proper time comes I intend to offer a substitute for section 7 which shall declare the law as to labor unions, which shall recite what they may do, and leave the power of the courts in administering their rights as it now is.

I have never thought it wise, as is done in section 18, to attempt to declare that an injunction shall not be issued to restrain a person from doing so and so. I have believed that we ought to say that it is not unlawful for persons to do so and so; and if the act itself be not unlawful, no court can prohibit it by way of injunction, nor can any court penalize it by way of damages. Our code with regard to labor unions ought to be contained in section 7 instead of section 18. I shall present at the proper time—I do not think this is the proper time—a substitute for that section, dealing with it in that way.

Now, a word or two with regard to the section itself as it now is. I said I was not satisfied with it. I am not. I am not satisfied with it, first, because in the description of labor organizations the purposes for which the members of such an organization can combine are not stated. What are labor organizations? We understand fairly well what a labor union is, but a labor organization, as stated in the bill, may be anything that pertains to labor; and if it be confined to laboring men, as it is not always, there is not a suggestion as to the purposes for which they can lawfully organize. No one would contend that the members of a labor organization could come together for the purpose of destroying the property of an employer. No one would contend that a labor organization could embody in its articles of association any immoral or any unlawful purpose; and yet the bill as it was proposed in the House, and as it came to the Senate, and as it still is, does not attempt to define the purposes for which a labor organization can be created.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VARDAMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator says the bill does not attempt to state the purposes for which the organization may be created. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill provides that labor organizations instituted for purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, are legalized.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course every association is for mutual help.

Mr. CULBERSON. I was not arguing the sufficiency of the designation, but I wanted to attract the attention of the Senator to the fact that the attempt was made in the bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; I understand. The point I make is this: We recognize the wisdom, indeed the necessity, for the organization of laboring men, the purposes being to increase their compensation, to lessen the hours of their labor, and to render more tolerable the conditions of labor. Those are the objects of such a labor organization as should be authorized and encouraged in the law; but we, very inadvisedly, and I think with hardly a fair comprehension of the subject, have simply denominated these organizations which are declared to be not within the antitrust law labor organizations organized for mutual help. I am sure that when we reflect upon it we will go back to the old definition, the definition contained in the English trade act, the definition contained in every act that I have ever known to be presented here until this one, namely, labor unions or labor organizations for the purpose of increasing wages, lessening hours of labor, and bettering the conditions of labor. We can not afford to say that every labor organization, no matter what its purposes may be, is unobjectionable under the antitrust law.

I pass on now to the next part of the section. I have already given my view with regard to the character of labor and why laboring men have a high right to combine with each other to advance their own interests. We find in this section a proposal to extend the same immunity to agricultural organizations and horticultural organizations.

I should like some person who understands the subject better than I do to tell the Senate what an agricultural organization is. I venture to say that an organization of Chicago packers, for the purpose of buying all the live stock of the country, is an agricultural organization. I venture to say that an association which was to take into one ownership as trustee all the cereals of the United States or all the cotton of the Southern States would be an agricultural organization.

It does not confine the immunity to farmers' organizations. I would not be for it even if it were so confined, for I do not believe the farmers of this country desire that their commodities should be so treated. They deal in commodities precisely as a manufacturer deals in commodities. The farmer produces a commodity, and he produces it either for consumption or for sale. I venture to say that the farmers of this country do not desire the privilege of uniting their commodities in a single association or under the control of a single association so as to enhance by that combination the prices at which these commodities shall be sold.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator comes from a State which, perhaps, has the largest agricultural product of the country, and that is a good deal for one from Ohio to admit. I wish to ask the Senator whether, in his State, there is any sentiment among the farmers in behalf of this exemption? I have not learned of any from my State.

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator means to ask me whether there is any demand among the farmers of my State for an amelioration or change in the law that would permit agricultural products to be monopolized, and thus affect their prices, there is no such demand. If, on the other hand, he means to ask me whether they desire to continue to have county fairs and harvest homes and old-settlers' picnics and other organizations of that kind, largely composed of farmers in my State, I say unhesitatingly "yes." I have never heard it suggested, however, that these associations where farmers gather together in a neighborhood, a county, a State, for the purpose of exchanging information, of increasing acquaintance, of cultivating good fellowship, were contrary to the antitrust law. I have never heard anybody suggest anything of that kind, and I think it has never been asserted. If this clause with regard to agricultural associations has any effect whatsoever, it must be that it is intended to allow associations that can control the commodities which farmers produce as to their prices. I assume that a provision which would permit an association to control their prices in an upward way and would also permit some other association to control their prices in a downward way.

I ask again, What is an agricultural organization? I have referred to the dictionary and other sources of information with regard to the meaning of the word "agricultural," and I find that the very first definition of the word is "of or pertaining to agriculture; connected with agriculture." It would be entirely within the meaning of the words "agricultural organization" if we were to find an association not one member of which was a farmer or who produced the commodity, but the members of which were associated together for the purpose of affecting agricultural products.

I almost fear that such an association as the International Harvester Co. is an agricultural organization. If it were not a corporation organized for pecuniary profit, it certainly would be an agricultural organization; and it would be the easiest thing in the world to organize a like concern the purpose of which was to benefit pecuniarily its members, and in which the organization itself would have no pecuniary profit and no capital stock.

I am not in favor of this invasion of the antitrust law. It is wholly different from the subject of labor, for it deals in commodities and in articles of commerce and not in the human power which produces commodities or articles of commerce. We shall regret it if we make this inroad upon a statute upon which we have come to rely with so great confidence.

If the section is limited merely to those associations of farmers and of fruit growers who come together, as we see every year, for mutual help—that is, mutual information—that is another thing. We have these associations in every vocation and every industry in the United States. We have the farmers' organizations; we have the retail dealers' associations; we have the wholesale dealers' associations; we have the manufacturers' associations. We have associations, I think, in every vocation in which people are engaged. No one has ever pretended that these organizations are in restraint of trade. It is absurd. We are in danger of becoming hysterical with regard to the construction of the antitrust law.

It was not designed to prevent cooperation of the sort I have indicated, and there is no demand for introducing the clause I have recited in this section unless it is intended that through these organizations there may be a monopolistic price attached to some commodity produced through agriculture or through horticulture. I know that the country not only does not demand a change of that sort, but it will resent a change of that kind.

When the time comes, Mr. President, I intend to offer a substitute for the section. I have it before me now. It may not be literally perfect, but it expresses my view of the matter vastly better than the provisions of this bill. While I do not offer it now, I intend to take the liberty of reading it just at this moment, so that Senators may be advised of its general scope:

SEC. 7. The labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce, and nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor organizations having for their objects bettering the conditions, lessening the hours, or advancing the compensation of labor, nor to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from carrying out said objects in a lawful way; nor shall said laws be construed to prevent or prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from terminating any relation of employment or from ceasing to work or from advising or persuading others, in a peaceful, orderly way, and at a place where they may lawfully be, either to work or abstain from working, or from withholding their patronage from a party to any dispute growing out of the terms or conditions of employment, or from advising or persuading other wageworkers, in a peaceful and orderly way, so to do, or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value, or from assembling in a peaceful way, for a lawful purpose, in any place where they may lawfully be, or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute.

So much of it refers to labor. I cover the remainder of the section in this way:

Nothing contained in said antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of agricultural, horticultural, or commercial organizations instituted for mutual benefit, without capital stock, and not conducted for the pecuniary profit of either such organizations or the members thereof, or to forbid or restrain such members from carrying out said objects in a lawful way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. If his substitute were adopted, and laboring men anywhere in a laboring man's newspaper should publish, under the head "We do not patronize," the names of JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS and various other people, could not they be prosecuted under the law as it then would be?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not think so, if I understand the question of the Senator from Mississippi. I may state my purpose in this amendment, so that the Senator may at least read it in the light of my object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I listened to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I believe in the strike. I believe the direct boycott of the offending or unfair employer is a fair weapon. I do not believe in the secondary boycott. I do not believe labor unions or any other organizations ought to be permitted to combine together to injure or destroy an innocent man because he may have dealings with a person who may be unfair to labor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not quite the point I had in mind. I understand that; and I, like the Senator, believe in "boycotts," in the sense in which he is now using—that is, the right to refuse to patronize—not, of course, in the original sense of the word as derived from the fate of the unfortunate Capt. Boycott. When our forefathers made ready to resist Great Britain, the first thing they did was to boycott British goods; and I remember a time in the hard struggles of carpetbag days down South, when a man who was a large manufacturer in Indiana gave utterance to some very bitter expressions about the southern people, when mass meetings were held everywhere, and resolutions were passed that they would not buy any of his manufactured products, and they did not until he apologized by the explanation route, all of which I believe to be perfectly right. I go further. A man might come out to-morrow—take my own church as an instance, not that I am much of a churchman—and say that Episcopalians were all sorts of wicked and bad things, and tell all sorts of lies about them. I think the Episcopalians would have the right to agree, not only one Episcopalian but all of them, in one combined voice that they would not patronize that man, and ask fair-minded men everywhere not to patronize him.

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly. That is the primary boycott.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe civilization depends very largely upon the operation of the moral sense of a community, through ostracism, at times, if necessary, and frequently through what may be called a qualified boycott, but the point I had in view was the direct one, not the secondary one at all.

The Senator will remember that the labor unions were enjoined from putting upon a black list a certain manufacturer of hats, and that after that, obeying that injunction, they merely published the name of that manufacturer of hats under the heading: "We do not patronize."

Now, that was all there was to it; and yet, under that, and because of that, those men were held up for violating the injunction and were about to be punished for contempt. I do not know whether they ever have been punished or not. I believe the statute of limitations intervened somewhere and they were not punished. I regarded that as one of the most high-handed pieces of judicial tyranny that ever has been perpetrated in any country in the world.

Mr. CUMMINS. So it was.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator will also remember another case where certain men were enjoined from quitting work. Now, that was a sympathetic strike; but I never could see a reason why a man should not quit work for any reason that was good to him, or without giving or having any reason.

Mr. CUMMINS. Nor I, either.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nor why any number of men should not combine to quit work for any reason that was good, or without any reason.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have insisted on that so often this afternoon that I am simply guilty of gross reiteration when I say that I believe so, too. I think a man has a right to quit work alone or with his companions, with agreement or without agreement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Primarily or sympathetically.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not make a bit of difference; but the point I make is this: Here were certain hat makers in Danbury, Conn. They had a dispute with their employer, and it grew into a bitter warfare.

I am looking at it now from my own point of view. The employees had a perfect right to say "We will buy no hats made by this concern, and we will ask everybody else to wear no hats made by this concern," but they come to a dealer in my town, a clothing man. Hats are simply one of a great many articles that he carries. There are cuffs, collars, neckties, shirts, and a thousand other things in his stock. I do not believe that they have any right to come to him and combine and say "Unless you quit buying hats of the Danbury man we will not buy anything from you; we will cease to buy your neckties and your shirts and your clothing and your boots and shoes and everything else that you may have to sell." I do not believe that that is a fair weapon in the war.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator that that is going to a very unwise and extreme extent; but that does not touch the question of right. Have I not a right to refuse to deal with a man for any reason, say, because he is red-headed, and have I not a right to agree with other people not to deal with him because he is a red-headed man?

Mr. CUMMINS. You have a perfect right to refuse to deal with him, but you have no right to combine or to enter into a conspiracy with a thousand other people that they will not deal with a certain man because he is red-headed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Leaving that out, we both agree, at any rate, that that would be carrying things to what I consider an unfair extreme.

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes; that is what I claim for it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But a man has a right, to carry it to that extent, as far as I can see, in combination or otherwise, though it may be a right which it is foolish or even not fair to exercise. There are forming all over this country some of the most useful societies that I know of in the social uplifting and the industrial uplifting of the country, mainly women, joining together for a laudable purpose now. They find that a department store, for example, makes its employees—women—stand up all day long, and that they work them 16 hours a day. So they publish a list of the people, and they say, "Those people do not treat their employees fairly." Then all the members of that society at once refuse to deal with those people until they do treat their employees fairly.

I think that public opinion invoked in that way is a stronger weapon than any law in the world looking to the uplift of the condition of the industrial labor of the country. I would dislike to see anything in any bill that might possibly be tortured into an interference with that sort of thing.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, the amendment I read expressly authorizes that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But that is not a labor organization at all.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know how we could call it a labor organization. They call themselves "consumers' leagues," I believe—just why I do not quite understand.

Mr. CUMMINS. The amendment I shall offer expressly declares that such a proceeding upon the part of laboring men shall not be construed to be a restraint of trade.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will excuse me for bothering him one minute more——

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator said he did not see how this exemption could apply to farmers in a way desired by them. I will give the Senator an illustration in order that he may direct his mind toward it.

Take the cotton crop, for example. America possesses almost a monopoly of cotton production; that is to say, she produces such a great percentage of the cotton crop of the world that the supply of American cotton fixes the price of cotton in the markets of the world. Cotton planters and farmers come together when cotton is very low because of an abnormally large crop and large visible supply, and they agree to decrease the acreage for the next crop, because we frequently get more money for a small crop than for a large one.

If there is no exception of farmers' organizations from the operation of this act and the existing antitrust law, then in my opinion a farmers' union of the South, meeting and passing resolutions and agreeing to curtail the production of cotton is a thing done "in restraint of trade"—there can be no doubt of that—and they would be subject to prosecution unless they were exempted in this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. They have been, then, for 20 years subject to prosecution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I know, and the only reason why they have not been prosecuted is because the prosecuting officers were afraid of the farmers' vote. The Senator knows that as well as I. There may be, however, some day some prosecuting officer who will not be afraid, and he might give them a good deal of trouble in a matter of that sort.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rather agree with the Senator from Mississippi that that would be a violation of the antitrust law.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is not any doubt about it; but it ought not to be prosecuted, because it is a perfectly justifiable means of defending one's self against a positive loss in production, by merely affecting the natural law of supply and demand.

I was very sorry this morning that we struck out the word "consumers." I think the best thing that we could do right now would be to boycott eggs, let us say, for example; to hold meetings and say we would not use any eggs until these miserable robbers reduce the exploitive price they have put on them; and then after we succeeded in bringing them to their knees on eggs—that is, bringing them to a reasonable price—the consumers' league could declare that they will boycott the use of a lot of other things for a while—meat, for example, and fowls—until the robbers concluded to accept reasonable prices. However, that has been passed and settled.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that there may be a great many restraints of trade which for the time being will prove beneficial? But I will ask him this question: The railroads are by far the greatest consumers of iron and steel products. Would the Senator from Mississippi favor such a change in the law as would enable the railroads of the country to combine and dictate the prices of the steel which they might thereafter buy?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would not have the slightest fear of that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Then the antitrust law is of no value, anyhow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not the slightest fear of that, practically, because they could not refuse to buy steel any longer than a certain length of time. They would be compelled to have rails. They would be compelled to have rolling stock. They would have to go on the market for them. The Steel Trust, upon the other side, moreover, is about as strong as they are. It would be a Kilkenny cat fight, in which I would not be very much interested.

I can imagine cases where the consumer of some product might be so strong that he would have to be curbed in his cunning, in the exercise of his force or power.

But leaving that out, which is a mere offshoot of the argument, it seems to me that the labor organizations and farmers' organizations are not in any sense a commercial or an industrial affair. While this bill was directed in its origin and ought to be directed now and confined to industrial and commercial organizations—to great concentrations of money strength, which owing to their concentration can become dangerous to the public—these other people, farmers and factory hands, can never become dangerous as a money power, being mere voluntary organizations without any profit behind them to drive them to exploitive and tyrannical acts. They are acting in self-defense as a rule. If they use violence, the only way in which they may become dangerous to the liberties or property of society, the criminal law is there to curb and punish them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think, Mr. President, that there are a great many instances in which cooperation could be employed with great advantage, but the difficulty is, as has been stated here more than once, this is a country of law, and we must describe the offense as certainly as we can, and then it must fall equally upon all who are within its terms.

I have no doubt that if we had an infinitely wise and patriotic and sensible person to administer the affairs of the United States, he could administer them in each individual instance with better advantage than they are administered through general law; but we have no such person. And so long as we are dependent upon general law we ought not to make an exception. Long before the Senator from Mississippi came in I attempted to demonstrate that the legislative declaration, to the effect that labor unions were not restraints of trade, was not an exemption of these unions from the operation of the law because of the difference between labor and a commodity.

I repeat that it disturbs me to hear labor termed a commodity—to hear the power of a man or woman to exercise the strength of mind or body in the production of something useful to the human race confused with the product which is the result of its exercise. It destroys all the distinctions that we ought to preserve. I close as I began with the insistence that when labor unions, with the purpose that I have described, are declared to be without the antitrust law, we are simply recognizing the essential character of things and are making a legislative declaration or interpretation of the law rather than classifying the people of the country and allowing one class to escape and another class to be bound.

Mr. NELSON. I wish the Senator would be good enough to have his amendment offered and printed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think I will do that, so that it may be seen. I offer it as a substitute for section 7. I intend to discuss it further when we are considering section 18.

The amendment was ordered to lie on the table and be printed and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. CUMMINS to the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, viz: Insert as a substitute for section 7 the following:

"SEC. 7. That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce, and nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor organizations having for their objects bettering the conditions, lessenings the hours, or advancing the compensation of labor, nor to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from carrying out said objects in a lawful way; nor shall said laws be construed to prevent or prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from terminating any relation of employment or from ceasing to work or from advising or persuading others in a peaceful, orderly way, and at a place where they may lawfully be, either to work or abstain from working, or from withholding their patronage from a party to any dispute growing out of the terms or conditions of employment or from advising or persuading other wageworkers in a peaceful and orderly way so to do, or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value, or from assembling in a peaceful and orderly way for a lawful purpose in any place where they may lawfully be, or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute. Nothing contained in said antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of agricultural, horticultural, or commercial organizations instituted for mutual benefit without capital stock and not conducted for the pecuniary profit of either such organization or the members thereof, or to forbid or restrain such members from carrying out said objects in a lawful way."

Mr. KERN. I should like a unanimous agreement that the Senate take a recess not later than 5.45 until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LEWIS in the chair). Does the Chair hear any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES. I suppose the Senator from Indiana is going to move an executive session and that we will not return into legislative session to-day.

Mr. KERN. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana. Therefore it is ordered.

Mr. KERN. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

NATIONAL CEMETERY, NASHVILLE, TENN.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 246) to authorize the Secretary of War to issue a revocable license for the use of lands adjoining the national cemetery near Nashville, Tenn., for public-road purposes, and I submit a report (No. 756) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to permit all or any part of the land belonging to the United States and lying outside of and adjoining the north and west walls inclosing the national cemetery near Nashville, Tenn., to be used for a public road and to be maintained by the local authorities. But such license or permit shall be issued at the discretion of the Secretary of War and upon such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, and may be revoked at any time, with or without cause.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, August 20, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, from whom cometh all strength, all wisdom, all justice and purity, be very near, we beseech Thee, to those to whom the welfare of our great Nation has been committed—our President and his counselors, our legislators and all others in authority—that they may be guided to a right solution of all the delicate and intricate problems which now confront us. And Thine shall be the praise through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

PRICES PAID FOR WHEAT IN KANSAS.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution 571.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. DOOLITTLE] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolution (H. Res. 571) requesting the Secretary of Commerce to report to the House all facts and information in his possession concerning the prices paid for wheat to the producer thereof in the State of Kansas, and the prices at which said wheat is sold for export by dealers, concerns, and exporters at Kansas City, Mo., and how such prices are fixed and determined.

Whereas there has this year been produced in the State of Kansas approximately 180,000,000 bushels of wheat; and

Whereas said wheat is now being moved to markets in and outside the said State of Kansas in large quantities; and

Whereas large quantities thereof are sold to different grain dealers, concerns, and exporters at Kansas City, Mo.; and

Whereas the average purchase price of said wheat paid to the producer is 63 cents per bushel at the loading elevators within the State of Kansas, and large quantities of the same wheat are sold for export by grain dealers, concerns, and exporters at Kansas City, Mo., for 82½ cents per bushel to 85 cents per bushel; and

Whereas the cost of transportation and other expenses from any shipping point in the State of Kansas to Kansas City, Mo., is far less than 20 cents per bushel; and

Whereas it is stated and believed that a combination, agreement, and understanding in restraint of trade exists between certain dealers, concerns, and exporters of wheat in Kansas City, Mo., to depress the purchase price paid for wheat to the producer: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of Commerce report to this body all facts and information in his possession concerning the prices paid for wheat to the producer thereof in the State of Kansas and the prices at which said wheat is sold for export by dealers, concerns, and exporters at Kansas City, Mo., and how such prices are fixed and determined.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I understand the resolution provides that the Secretary of Commerce shall make this investigation?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that any investigation that is made in reference to farm products ought to be made by the Department of Agriculture, which has some information on the subject and some men who are experts. Without any reflection at all upon the Department of Commerce, I think they do not have in that department men who are experts on the questions affecting the price or sale of farm products.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will say to the gentleman that at his own suggestion I took up that question with the Department of Agriculture, and I was informed by the Secretary that for the purposes of carrying out this resolution they did not have the machinery. On the other hand, the Secretary of Commerce stated to me specifically that he did have the machinery—the men who know how to do it.

Mr. MANN. Well, the only machinery that the Secretary of Commerce has is the Bureau of Corporations, and if there is anybody connected with the Bureau of Corporations who is especially informed as to such matters he ought to be given another job.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This resolution merely calls for information in the possession of the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. MANN. Well, that would not amount to anything.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He has the authority.

Mr. MANN. That is not the intention. I have no objection to an investigation being made; but the Department of Agriculture is engaged now in studying the question of the transportation and grades and grading and all matters connected with market production, market handling, and with the form of grading and marketing and handling grain products.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This is a local condition, I may say to the gentleman from Illinois, and it has been more or less distressing. We should have the information, and if the Department of Commerce can give it to us—and the Secretary says it can—most certainly it could do no damage, and it might do a great deal of good.

Mr. MANN. I think it might do a great deal more damage than good. We put in the Agricultural appropriation bill quite an appropriation for the studying of market conditions and the marketing of farm products—$250,000, I believe, and am so informed by a gentleman who would know. If they have not the machinery, I do not know where you would get it. Certainly the Bureau of Corporations has not the knowledge.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Office of Markets is not yet prepared to give us the information or to make the investigation.

Mr. MANN. The appropriation is made, and they could make the investigation under that. In other words, I believe that under the language "to study the subject of the marketing of the farm products" that study ought to be made by the Department of Agriculture, which is in sympathy with the farmer who produces, rather than the Department of Commerce, which is in sympathy with the reduction in the price of farm products, instead of keeping them at a proper price for the benefit of the farmer.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I hope the gentleman will not object to the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was one of the men who were instrumental in the creation of the Department of Commerce. He never intimated that it was for the purpose of building up an organization unsympathetic with the farmer and against the interests of the farmer.

Mr. MANN. No. I was the originator of the Bureau of Corporations. I intimated and always said that it was the duty of the Department of Commerce to study the interests of the manufacturer and commercial portion of the country. We had the Department of Agriculture to study the interests of the farmer.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold for a moment while I ask a question of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask him this question, reserving the right to object: When the gentleman introduced his first resolution, previous to the European conflict, there was a margin of some 20 cents between the export price of wheat at Kansas City and the price paid in the primary grain markets?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Since that time and since the outbreak in Europe virtually no wheat has been moving?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not very much.

Mr. MURDOCK. There has been an embargo on shipments in Galveston and on the Atlantic seaboard markets, and in the meanwhile the general ocean-carrying charge on wheat has jumped from 3 cents to 11 cents, and on account of that tremendous jump in the ocean freight charge I understand that from all over the world English tramp steamers are heading for the Atlantic and the Gulf ports to take advantage of the situation. Now, either before the war abroad or since the war began there has been a question out in Kansas as to the reason for the difference between what is paid in the primary wheat markets and what the exporter sells it for——

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have a substitute here——

Mr. MURDOCK. And you call for all information which the Secretary of Commerce now has. Of course he has no information bearing upon this matter now.

It does not seem that the language of this resolution would give him power to send men out to get it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I may say to the gentleman that Secretary Redfield has assured me that he would get the information that the House asked for.

Mr. MURDOCK. Under this resolution?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Yes; and he has two men ready to send. I also have a letter from him which has already been read, and is incorporated in the favorable report on the resolution from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. MURDOCK. Of course he will have to go outside of the limits of the language of this resolution to do it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Not outside of the interpretation of it as they have interpreted it. It is in the customary form.

Mr. MURDOCK. I hope we can get the information, whether by resolution or not.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the author of the resolution if his substitute broadens the scope of the inquiry beyond the State of Kansas?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No; it does not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman recalls that in the Agricultural appropriation act for the last fiscal year we carried an appropriation of $50,000 to enable that department to study marketing conditions. In the recent Agricultural appropriation act we carried an appropriation of $250,000 for the same purpose. Now, if the Agricultural Department can not obtain information like this with such an appropriation, how does the gentleman expect the Department of Commerce can get it without any appropriation?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am informed they can do it and will do it.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not think they can.

Mr. ADAMSON. The Secretary wrote a letter stating that he could.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And he so stated to me.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman that I am perfectly willing to let the Agricultural Department make any investigation in reference to prices or marketing conditions, or farm products, but I am not willing to turn that over to any other department of the Government while the Agricultural Department is engaged in making such investigations. I think the Agricultural Department ought to make the investigations relating to farm products.

Mr. MURDOCK. What was the gentleman's substitute?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Would the gentleman from Illinois object to the present consideration of the resolution if it were directed to the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. MANN. I would not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I do not intend to have a resolution like this fixed up just to suit any one person here.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] is recognized.

CUSTOMS APPEALS.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill S. 6116 be taken from the Speaker's table and put upon its immediate passage. A bill identical thereto has been reported by the House Judiciary Committee and is on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill (S. 6116) to amend section 195 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Section 195 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, be, and hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 195. That the Court of Customs Appeals established by this chapter shall exercise exclusive appellate jurisdiction to review by appeal, as herein provided, final decisions by a board of general appraisers in all cases as to the construction of the law and the facts respecting the classification of merchandise and the rate of duty imposed thereon under such classifications, and the fees and charges connected therewith, and all appealable questions as to the jurisdiction of said board, and all appealable questions as to the laws and regulations governing the collection of the customs revenues; and the judgments and decrees of said Court of Customs Appeals shall be final in all such cases: Provided, however, That in any case in which the judgment or decree of the Court of Customs Appeals is made final by the provisions of this title, it shall be competent for the Supreme Court, upon the petition of either party, filed within 60 days next after the issue by the Court of Customs Appeals of its mandate upon decision, in any case in which there is drawn in question the construction of the Constitution of the United States, or any part thereof, or of any treaty made pursuant thereto, or in any other case when the Attorney General of the United States shall, before the decision of the Court of Customs Appeals is rendered, file with the court a certificate to the effect that the case is of such importance as to render expedient its review by the Supreme Court, to require, by certiorari or otherwise, such case to be certified to the Supreme Court for its review and determination, with the same power and authority in the case as if it had been carried by appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court; And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any case involving only the construction of section 1, or any portion thereof, of an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved August 5, 1909, nor to any case involving the construction of section 2 of an act entitled 'An act to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes,' approved July 26, 1911."

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire if a similar bill is on the House Calendar?

Mr. WEBB. An absolutely identical bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is——

Mr. FITZGERALD. It can not be done except by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Why can it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Because this is Calendar Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. Suppose it is.

Mr. WEBB. I do not imagine the gentleman from New York will object to unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to find out something about it.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman asked unanimous consent.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He asked unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The rule does not bear out the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Perhaps not.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides that—

On Wednesday of each week no business shall be in order except as provided by paragraph 4 of this rule, unless the House by a two-thirds vote, on a motion to dispense therewith, shall otherwise determine.

Paragraph 4 reads:

After the unfinished business has been disposed of the Speaker shall call each standing committee in regular order.

This is before the unfinished business.

Mr. MANN. The rule says that no other business shall be in order. That has been the ruling of the Speaker heretofore.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asked unanimous consent, and that settles it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask the gentleman to state exactly what is proposed to be done by this change.

Mr. WEBB. I can state it very briefly. When the Court of Customs Appeals was created, there was no provision whatever for an appeal in any case from that court, strange to say. Theretofore customs cases had been brought to the Supreme Court from the Board of Appraisers and through the circuit courts; but when the customs court was created there was no provision for an appeal from that court.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was for the purpose of taking out of the United States Supreme Court a great mass of litigation which cumbered the docket of that court.

Mr. WEBB. That is very true. The bill before us provides that whenever the Constitution of the United States or a treaty is drawn in question by a decision of the Court of Customs Appeals, then either side may ask for a writ of certiorari to the Supreme Court of the United States—not to take an appeal as a matter of right, but to ask the court for the right to appeal—and if the Supreme Court of the United States think it is a question that ought to be decided by them, they can take it up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That would include cases involving the construction of the Constitution or a treaty.

Mr. WEBB. That is all. In other cases where the Attorney General, before the customs court has passed upon a case, certifies that it should be carried to the Supreme Court, either side may ask for a certiorari. A large per cent of such applications is turned down by the Supreme Court. This bill is important at this time, because the question of the 5 per cent drawback or discount on imports in American bottoms is now pending, you may say, and that case involves many treaties.

It is not believed that this inferior customs court should pass finally upon a great matter of that sort. I might say that this pending case will affect the revenue to the extent of ten or twelve million dollars a year. Claims are being piled up against the Government. The Attorney General ruled that the 5 per cent clause was void on account of our treaty obligations. The customs officers held with the Attorney General, but the Board of Appraisers held differently, and the ruling of the Treasury Department still holds, and these cases are going to the Court of Customs Appeals.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I read the House bill and the report, and am not quite clear now, but it seems to me that a certificate had to be filed in advance of the decision of the customs court in order to retain the right of appeal to the Supreme Court. Is that correct?

Mr. WEBB. That is correct in cases where the Constitution and treaty are not drawn in question. In all other cases each side can ask for a certiorari when the Attorney General certifies, before the decision of the court is made, that the case is of such importance that it ought to be carried to the Supreme Court.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know the opinion of the Treasury Department as to the amount of business that this is likely to send to the Supreme Court?

Mr. WEBB. Assistant Attorney General Wimple, who represented this court, and the Attorney General himself said it would be very small—probably not two cases in five years.

Mr. MANN. I notice that this bill provides that there can be no appeal in reference to the wood-pulp section in the Canadian reciprocity act.

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Why should not the Government have the benefit of the Supreme Court in that matter?

Mr. WEBB. I think that the Government ought to have that right, and Assistant Attorney General Wimple was very insistent that it should, but the Treasury Department said that since wood pulp had been put upon the free list they considered the matter a closed incident. Such right was in the original bill, and insisted on by the Assistant Attorney General, but we saw at once the the paper folks all over the country were going to raise strennous objection.

Mr. MANN. Whom does the gentleman mean by "the paper folks"?

Mr. WEBB. The wood-pulp people.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; just the other way. The pulp and paper manufacturers would like to get a decision from the Supreme Court of the United States, because the customs court decision was against them. Still I apprehend that it would be difficult to get a bill through the Senate or the House by unanimous consent where the newspaper people did not want it to pass and they do not want a review by the Supreme Court of the United States. So to that extent we are bowing to the power of the press.

Mr. WEBB. I can say that the power of the press had nothing to do with our decision. The Treasury Department told the committee that as wood pulp had been put on the free list and the matter had been settled by the court it would not insist on reviewing the court's decision. It was settled quite a while—probably a year ago—and they were willing to drop the matter and consider it closed, and that is why we exempted the Canadian reciprocity provision.

A brief review of legislation providing tribunals for passing upon customs claims may be of value in determining the necessity for passing the pending bill.

In the course of time the work of settling customs claims grew to such an extent that it was thought desirable to relieve the regular courts of this work and to provide tribunals to hear and determine such matters.

On June 10, 1890, Congress passed the act entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues." By section 14 thereof the decision of the collector as to rates and amount of duties chargeable upon imported merchandise, and so forth, was made final and conclusive against all persons interested therein, unless the owner, importer, consignee, or agent, and so forth, should, within 10 days after, "but not before," such ascertainment and liquidation of duties, if dissatisfied with such decision, give notice in writing, and so forth, and upon such notice and payment the collector was required to transmit the invoice and all the papers and exhibits connected therewith to the board of three general appraisers which should be on duty at the port of New York, or to a board of three general appraisers who might be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury for such duty at that port or at any other port, and so forth.

Section 15 of the act provides for a review by the circuit court of the United States for that district, on application of either side, within 60 days after the decision of the appraisers. It is provided that the circuit court might then refer the case to one of the general appraisers, as an officer of the court, to take and return to the court such further evidence as might be offered by either side, under the rules of the court, within 60 days' time. It provides that the case should be heard upon such further evidence and the returns from the lower court; the circuit court's decision to be final, unless such court should be of the opinion that the question involved was of such importance as to require a review of such decision by the Supreme Court of the United States. In such cases said circuit court, or the judge making the decision, might, within 30 days thereafter, allow an appeal to said Supreme Court, but it provided that an appeal shall be allowed on the part of the United States whenever the Attorney General shall apply for it within 30 days after the rendition of such decision.

It was contended that under the provisions of the act of 1890 claimants did not, in good faith, present their evidence before the general appraisers, but did so in an indifferent manner, and trusted to their right to have other evidence presented in the circuit court, and their case finally determined upon that and the record from the lower court. To remedy this defect, it was provided in 1908 that all evidence in the case must be submitted to the Board of General Appraisers prior to their decision.

By the act of August 5, 1909, the Court of Customs Appeals was created and provision made for an Assistant Attorney General. The act provides that appeals from general United States appraisers can only be taken to this court, except in cases already tried, but then not yet heard on appeal.

This is the law to-day governing this class of litigation, as shown by section 195 of the act of March 3, 1911, which the bill under consideration seeks to amend.

It seems manifest, from the review of legislation, that Congress had in mind constituting the Court of Customs Appeals a court of final review to take care of the many questions that would arise affecting the construction of the revenue laws as to rates and classifications, and thus relieve the general courts of this detailed work. This it seems to have accomplished.

Since the act of 1909 it has been found that this Court of Customs Appeals has been called on to pass upon not only questions of rates and classifications, but also questions involving a construction of the Constitution and our treaties with other nations. In a few instances it has been called on to settle questions not involving a construction of the Constitution or treaties, which were of much importance on account of the amount of money involved.

The case of American Express Co. against United States, tried and determined by this court, as reported in the fourth volume of their decisions, on page 146, was a case involving the construction of our Constitution and treaties with other nations. The court was asked to determine whether the granting of free importation of wood pulp from Canada did not automatically, under the "favored-nation clause" in our treaties with other nations, nullify the act of Congress in so far as it attempted to lay a duty on wood pulp brought in by such other nations.

It was contended by the importers that, under our Constitution, treaties were to be construed as a part of our fundamental law, and therefore, of necessity, had to be read into the acts of Congress and construed by the court. The Government contended that treaty provisions, such as were involved in this case, were only executory promises and not binding upon the courts until written into our statute law by Congress. Under the decision in this case the Government will be required to repay to the importers about $3,000,000.

As examples of cases not involving a construction of the Constitution or treaties, we would cite the controversy with the Indian Government, as to whether the metallic or the exchange value of the rupee was the proper basis of taxation, which involved something like $1,000,000; and the question as to the proper classification of saki, the national drink of the Japanese, which involved something like a half million dollars.

The bill now being reported only modifies the existing law to the extent of providing that the decisions of the Court of Customs Appeals may be reviewed by the Supreme Court—in any case in which there is drawn in question the construction of the Constitution of the United States, or any part thereof, or of any treaty made pursuant thereto, or in any other case where the Attorney General of the United States shall, before the decision of the Court of Customs Appeals is rendered, file with the court a certificate to the effect that the case is of such importance as to render expedient its review by the Supreme Court, to require, by certiorari or otherwise, such case to be certified to the Supreme Court for its review and determination, with the same power and authority in the case as if it had been carried by appeal or writ of error to the Supreme Court: And provided further, That this act shall not apply to any case involving only the construction of section 1, or any portion thereof, of "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," approved August 5, 1909, nor to any case involving the construction of section 2 of an act entitled "An act to promote reciprocal trade relations with the Dominion of Canada, and for other purposes," approved July 26, 1911.

Exception 1 covers all that portion of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law which levies the tariff taxes.

Exception 2 covers all that portion of the reciprocity act with Canada relating to wood pulp.

Whether Congress meant to give to this court the final jurisdiction in all such important cases, especially involving the construction of the Constitution and of treaties, when it made their decision final "in all cases as to construction of the law and facts respecting the classification of merchandise and the rate of duty imposed thereon under such classification, and the fees and charges connected therewith," etc., has been determined by this court taking such final jurisdiction. The only way now to limit their final jurisdiction to these matters of classification and rates is by amendment.

The Supreme Court of the United States, being the highest judicial tribunal in the Nation, should finally pass upon such important matters as affects the Constitution and treaties and the exceptional cases vitally affecting the Nation's revenue where the Constitution and treaties are not involved.

It is not thought that there would be very many cases, under the last class, reviewed, but cases, from time to time, will arise, and it is desirable to have in this amendment a provision by which such questions could be finally settled by the highest court. These cases would be limited to those in which the Attorney General would file his certificate before the decision, and after this the Supreme Court itself would determine whether the case was a proper one for their review.

This amendment will affect the final jurisdiction of the Court of Customs Appeals in cases arising under the tariff law of 1913.

The Treasury Department has asked the opinion of the Attorney General upon subsection 7 of paragraph J of section 4 of the tariff act of 1913, which section reads as follows:

That a discount of 5 per cent on all duties imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be imported in vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this subsection shall be construed as to abridge or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of any treaty concluded between the United States and any foreign nation.

The Attorney General reported that, on account of provisions in treaties with other countries, this section was inoperative. The Treasury Department, acting upon this opinion, instructed the collectors of customs to not allow the 5 per cent discount. Protests were filed by importers, and the general appraisers heard the case and ruled as follows:

We conclude that subsection 7 of paragraph J of section 4, tariff act of 1913, should be enforced according to its letter; that dutiable goods imported in vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States should be conceded a 5 per cent discount from the duties provided for in the other parts of the statute.

From this ruling both sides appealed to the Court of Customs Appeals. These cross appeals will, in their order, be reviewed by the Court of Customs Appeals, and if this bill is promptly passed the cases can be reviewed by the Supreme Court without unnecessary delay.

Pending the final settlement of the question no discount is being allowed, and claims are being filed against the Government amounting to from $7,000,000 to $10,000,000 per year. Either a very large amount will have to be held as a contingent fund or, if the Government finally loses the cases, some provision will have to be made for settling the claims.

It is generally conceded that this case should be carried before the Supreme Court for final decision. Mr. Levett, representing the Merchants' Association of New York, admits that personally he thinks it should. The Government is anxious to have it thus passed upon as early as possible. There are widely differing opinions as to what should be the proper ruling upon this question, as will be found in the printed hearings before the Judiciary Committee upon this bill.

The Treasury Department has given its indorsement to this measure and urged its speedy passage, as shown by the following letter:

JUNE 10, 1914.

HON. EDWIN Y. WEBB,
Chairman Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives.

SIR: Under date of April 3, 1914, I had occasion to call your attention to bill H. R. 15960, now pending before the Committee on the Judiciary, providing for a review by the Supreme Court of decisions of the Court of Customs Appeals in certain customs cases, including those involving constitutional and treaty questions.

As the matter is one of the greatest importance to this department and to the proper administration of the customs, I wish to impress upon you again the necessity of early action by Congress on this measure. There are many cases now pending involving the 5 per cent shipping clause of the tariff. This issue is one of the greatest importance to the Treasury Department. Should the decision of the Customs Court of Appeals be adverse to the Government, the possible refunds might run from ten to twelve million dollars a year, and would materially reduce the revenue from customs. Constitutional and treaty questions are frequently raised in tariff issues, and they all are matters of the greatest importance and should be left for the final determination of the Supreme Court.

For these reasons I would therefore urge that prompt action be taken by the committee, with the view that this legislation be passed during the present session of Congress.

Respectfully, W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

I hope, therefore, that the bill will pass at once, as it is very important to the revenues of the Government.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A similar House bill, H. R. 17147, to amend section 195 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," was laid on the table.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REVISION OF PRINTING LAWS.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the unfinished business is the House bill 15902. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. PAGE of North Carolina in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15902) to amend, revise, and codify the laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, there is neither politics, poetry, nor inspiration to oratory in this bill. It is a plain business proposition in which every Member of Congress and every reading and thinking individual in our country is interested, for it has to do with their general information, their convenience, and their expenditures. And inasmuch as I am anxious to spend as little time as possible in general debate and give you the most intelligent and comprehensive outline of the proposed legislation possible, it will be a favor if I be spared from interruptions during the formal presentation, and after I am through with this I will try to answer any interrogatories which may suggest themselves to you. But as the bill is lengthy and full opportunity will be given for the consideration of each section, we will save time, I believe, by curtailing debate as much as possible now, that we may the sooner commence the reading and detail consideration of the bill.

FOREWORD.

As a matter of information to all concerned, the Government has a public printing office, the buildings and equipment of which are invoiced at $5,500,000, the annual expenditure for the operation of the establishment is approximately $7,000,000, and the output must be the mental and mechanical product of the best and most accurate skill in the printer's art. The building is a model in architectural arrangement, the equipment is modern and complete, and the four thousand and odd employees have sanitary system, medical attention, and emergency hospital facilities highly creditable to the best Government in the world.

In addition, in comparison with the wage scales of printers, binders, and machinists in the printing industries of the large cities of the United States, as shown by the union wage scales published by the Department of Labor, our Government pays its Printing Office employees more than the general wage scales, it gives them an annual leave of absence of 30 days with full pay, it guarantees stable wages whether prosperity or panic prevails in the country, it provides them with medical and surgical relief during working hours, and it assures them permanent employment if they are faithful. With these ideal conditions as a foundation for a public printing service the people have a right to expect helpful results, and they may have if Congress will systematize and economize to the end that a maximum of service in useful public documents be given at a minimum of expense.

Your Committee on Printing has carefully and impartially considered the necessity for better legislation for this branch of the Government service. It has given hearings to all who asked to be heard and to many whose knowledge and advice might aid in the preparation of a good bill. And it has gathered data from the hearings and investigations of preceding committees in both House and Senate, and comes to you with the fundamentals, at least, of a just and wholesome measure, in which every Member is interested, regardless of politics.

The bill to revise the laws for printing, binding, and distribution of public documents now under consideration is the result of investigations by a Printing Commission and the Printing Committees of the House and Senate, which have been at work nine years. Several bills have been introduced as the result of the work of the commission and the committees, one of which passed the Senate two years ago, but reached the calendar too late for consideration in the House before the end of the term, when all bills die. And in the beginning I want to give most of the credit for the general features of reform in this bill to Representative DAVID E. FINLEY, former chairman of the House Committee on Printing; Senator REED SMOOT, former chairman of the Senate Printing Committee; and Mr. George Carter, clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing. Of course, others have rendered valuable assistance, and this bill has many new features which none of the others carried, added by Mr. TAVENNER, Mr. KIESS, and myself, and which, we believe, will contribute much to the efficiency, economy, and popularity of the legislation.

The impression is abroad that Members of Congress—in both branches—are following long-established customs of grab-bag methods in printing and franking privileges not creditable to those big enough to make laws for our national welfare. It is doubtful if this impression is justified, all things considered, but that there is a tremendous waste in our methods of printing and distributing public documents there is not a doubt, as the official report accompanying this bill will readily show you. You would be amazed if I were to tell you that in public-document procedure alone we surely waste a half million dollars a year; and add to this the wrapping, franking, envelopes, leave to print, and other excesses which this bill aims to correct and it will amount to more than a million dollars a year that is absolutely wasted, except to those who profit by the production.

FEATURES OF THE BILL.

Much of this bill is reaffirmation of existing law. Whenever present law has been found conducive to good results, it has not been changed, but the advantageous new features of the bill, as the committee sees them, grouped into general subjects, are as follows:

Valuation system of allotment of documents to Members, so each may have the publications he needs for distribution.

Restrictions of departments in free-hand and duplicate document printing.

Limitation of printing frank slips and envelopes, correcting both printing and franking abuses.

Restricting leave to print extraneous matter in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

More satisfactory plan for printing for committees.

Labor-saving method of folding, wrapping, and handling public documents.

Publication of morning bulletin of day's program of House and Senate business.

Rearrangement of Government printing officials and salaries.

More general supervision by joint committee and Public Printer over all public printing.

Requiring all printing and binding to be done at the Government Printing Office.

And providing fines and imprisonment for violations of franking and distribution privileges.

FAULTY DOCUMENT DISTRIBUTION.

Not only is our present system of printing and distributing extravagantly wasteful, but it does not give Members of Congress their allotment of the kind of publications that are most helpful to the people they represent. For instance, every Member of Congress sends out many publications to his people which are of little or no use to them, because they are allotted to him and he thinks it better to send them out than to let them lapse and be sold for junk paper. A Member in a purely agricultural district has little use for the publications useful in cities now allotted to him, and the Member representing the city has little or no use for much of the agricultural literature, and so forth, allotted to him. As it is now, Representatives from forest and prairie, from seacoast and interior, from cotton belt and wheat fields, from shop and live-stock ranch, and from city and country, are all given the same kind of free documents for their constituents and, of course, much of it is useless because it has no relation to conditions in the locality to which it is allotted.

Hereafter each Member of the House will be allotted $1,800 worth of public documents for his district each year, and each Senator $2,200 worth each year. This is practically the same expense the Government is now incurring in printing documents. But the advantages of the new system are many. In brief, the Printing Office will issue limited-edition copies of documents from time to time as the demand requires, and this will save much waste in printing allotment stuff not wanted, as is now done; each Member will be given only what he orders, and many will therefore draw less than their allotment, which will be another saving; no Member can draw on his allotment after his term expires, and new Members can supply the wants of their constituents as soon as their term begins and not encounter an exhausted document list because the predecessor had drawn out everything available, both present and future; Members can order what they need, and nothing else will be printed and wasted for them, and thus the people will get that which is helpful in their vicinity and vocation and there will be no excess printing of unwanted documents, as is always done where Members are given the same allotment of the various documents.

And so this provision will be a great saving in printing expense, a great convenience to Members, and a great help to those for whose benefit public documents are issued.

FRANKED STATIONERY PRINTING.

The franking privilege is much abused at much cost and without profit to any considerable number. True, this is a function of legislation not strictly within the province of this Committee on Printing, but we can help by the regulation of frank slip and envelope printing, so that the possibility of excessive franking shall be limited. To say nothing of the number of frank slips and white document envelopes used by Representatives during the past year, the Public Printer reports that twenty-two and a half million manila document envelopes of various sizes were furnished to Representatives and Senators—an average of 41,500 each. In addition to this, departments used millions, and committees and Members of the House and Senate were furnished with hundreds of thousands of free white envelopes and letter sheets for correspondence purposes, and each Member had his liberal cash stationary allowance besides. You say this is only the custom established by years of precedents. That is true, but wrongdoing is not justified by all the precedents and customs of the ages, and that the misusing of public funds in this way is plainly and inexcusably wrong who can deny?

How will our limitation of printing document envelopes and forbidding their use under penalty by others than Members work economy in franking expense? I will tell you: First, the abolition of the small-size document envelope will estop Members from using large quantities of them, contrary to law, in correspondence; second, it will stop the wholesale practice of inviting the public to pitch in for free public documents whether or not they are needed or used; third, it will stop the abuse of private interests promoting speeches in Congress, paying for the printing of large quantities of them and then using some Member's envelope, folding, and franking privilege to send them out; and, fourth, the curtailment of not-wanted document printing will discourage the practice that has long prevailed of some Members franking out any kind of useless document stuff just to show constituents on the mailing lists that they are not forgotten by their Representative in Congress.

FRANK-PRIVILEGE ABUSES.

If I were to give you all the reports of abuses of the franking privilege which have come to the knowledge of members of this committee, it would require a considerable extension of my time, and some of it might not be accurate, for evasion of the law is usually covered up; but if I were to tell you that 750,000 copies of the speech of a Member of Congress were recently sent to an agency in Philadelphia to be used by an organization to boost its purpose, and that the Government paid for the folding, for the envelope printing, and for the franking through the mails, you would have a hint of the possibilities of abuse of the franking privilege. Or if I were to cite the alleged distribution of a million and a half copies of speeches by a Member of Congress through Government franked envelopes by an organization which sought to exploit its ideas of a combined moral and industrial question, all at Government expense, you would see evidence of the abuse of the franking privilege. Or if I were to cite you to part 65 of the hearings pursuant to Senate resolution 92 by a Senate subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, you would be astounded at the evidence that 320,000 copies of a selfish interest pamphlet had been printed, wrapped, and franked at Government expense, and you would applaud the Post Office Department in its undertaking to recover from this selfish interest $57,600 postage expense which the Government incurred in transmitting this illegally franked document through the mails. Or if I were to tell you that a congressional campaign committee had more than a 1,000,000 Government-printed speech envelopes left over after a campaign, which represented a large public expense, and that these envelopes were disposed of as junk by some one unknown to a Government record, you would admit carelessness, to say the least. Or if I were to show you that a certain congressional exponent of a will-o'-the-wisp political propaganda had 2,000,000 speech envelopes printed at one time, and either sent them out carrying his hallucination or wasted them, you would be justified, after knowing these few instances of the many of the kind, in sidestepping your dignity far enough to exclaim, "Rotten!"

PENALTIES FOR VIOLATIONS.

I want to also call your attention to the fact that there are enough sharp teeth in this bill to protect the proposed law from imposition. Section 68 provides a fine of $1,000 as penalty for any Government distributing agent selling or disposing of for gain any public document printed for free distribution; and also provides a heavy fine of $5,000 or imprisonment for 5 years, or both, for any officer or employee of the Government Printing Office who violates this section. Section 35 provides a heavy fine of $3,000 or imprisonment for 7 years, or both, for the Public Printer if he shall by himself or in collusion with others defraud the Government. Section 36 provides a fine of $1,000 or imprisonment for 5 years, or both, for the Public Printer or any of his official subordinates if any such be interested in any industry which furnishes supplies for the Government Printing Office. And section 42 provides a fine of $300, which ought to be more severe, for any Member of Congress or agent or employee of the Government who shall assist any private institution or individual to the unlawful use of franked envelopes or frank slips.

Furthermore, section 69 protects the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from misuse by providing that any matter not spoken in order on the floor of the House or Senate shall first be offered, then considered by the respective Printing Committee, and passed on by the respective House before it be published. There is an exception, however, whereby leave-to-print matter germane to the subject under consideration may be inserted in the RECORD by unanimous consent, but it must be limited to four pages. And these provisions, the committee estimates, will greatly curtail the inconvenient bulk and the unnecessary expense of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which ought to be a succinct reproduction of the proceedings of Congress and not the carryall for every Tom, Dick, and Harry in the country to exploit his ideas at the expense of the Government and to the inconvenience of everybody who would like to read the actual proceedings of Congress.

ECONOMY IN THE BILL.

To the casual observer the proposed changes might seem inconsequential, but to the investigator they show large possibilities of retrenchment and benefit to the public service. In the matter of economy alone this bill must attract your approval. Here is a table of estimates of curtailment and increases of expenses carried in the bill which we ask you to inspect. It specifies the provisions of the bill upon which the committee bases its estimates of economies to be effected:

Total increases	87,199.80

In most instances the figures in this list are based on unquestionable statistics of actual saving. Other estimates of probable economies are based on conclusions of clerks and heads of divisions who are familiar with present practices which they know to be excessive and uselessly expensive. And, besides, we can safely add another big item of economy in franking cost to the Postal Service by the limitation of the free-for-all use of franked envelopes, in the lesser quantities of documents that will be sent out under the proposed allotment reform, in lesser number of documents of little or no interest to anybody, and in the reduction of bulk of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Yearbooks, and many other publications carrying a superfluity of space filled with reports, and so forth, in which the public has little or no concern. For instance, the elimination of the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture in the Yearbooks will amount to a saving of $16,000 worth of paper and printing and the weight of the book and consequent franking expense will be reduced proportionately. Many other similar instances of franking economy by reason of reduction in bulk could be cited, but you see the horse sense in the Yearbook illustration as well as the committee saw it and as the wayfaring man, though a fool, can see it.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.

Time forbids that I go into general details of the manifold merits of this bill. It has no politics in it, it has no favoritism in it, and it has no purpose except that Members of Congress be given a more helpful and more economic public printing service than now. Of course, it is not satisfactory to all. No improved legislation was ever proposed which curtailed privileges or eliminated unnecessary expense that did not incur opposition from those who want to be let alone or those who want more than consistency and justice to others will permit.

There are, as we believe, so many advantageous features in this bill that no Member of Congress can vote against it and serve his constituents best. It may be improved by amendments, and to that end the committee invites sincere endeavor from any source. But opposition which arises because the bill provides for a faithful public service, rather than continue the present method of a service wide open to imposition, ought not to have much influence with Members who are here to serve the public rather than the public serve them with advertising facilities.

It is high time that the people measure the merit of their Members of Congress by their work and votes in legislative endeavor rather than by the number of letters and the amount of free document stuff they can send out. But I would not be understood as opposed to the legitimate use of the franking privilege. The people have a right to know the nature of bills, what is being said of them, and what is being done in their Congress and by heads of their Government. They, too, have a right to Government helps in suggestions of experts in health, comfort, industry, and vocational endeavor. This is a people's Government, and they have a right to be liberally advised through free-postage privilege what is being done for them or to them, so they may intelligently direct the future by their votes.

The present methods of misusing the public printing and franking privilege is not graft. It is a custom that has grown up because of lax and flexible regulations, which mean most anything that precedent has established. It has not been violation of law, for there has been no well-defined enactment, and officials and Members have placed their own interpretations on what they have a right to use and the people's Treasury has suffered accordingly.

But hereafter the law will be specific if you enact this bill; department heads and Members will all know what is proper and what improper, and the public can easily learn from official publicity if their officials are overdoing in the matter of promiscuous document distribution.

Gentlemen, the citations in the committee report and in this presentation merely touch the high places of economic possibility in congressional printing and franking. Abuses that result from "everybody's business is nobody's business" are the bane of the public service. We can correct much that is wrong and wasteful by passing this bill, and we owe it to the country as exemplars of finance, of public trust, and of honor to do it.

There is an adage as old as honesty itself which says if we be true to ourselves we will not be false to others. Therefore, in fairness to Members of Congress and in justice to those whom they represent, we ought to pass this bill and make clear what is right and what is wrong in public-document printing and distribution. The misuse of Government printing and franking has been the stalking horse of common scandal for years, and whether it is warranted or not we can here efface the cause, and I believe it is up to every Member of this House to aid in this legislation by helping to make this bill plain and effective in the largest measure possible that this public service may be vastly improved and its use freed from criticism forever. [Applause.]

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of care to the able and careful presentation by the gentleman of the bill under consideration, and I have one suggestion that I desire to make to him. The gentleman speaks of the liberal allowance for printing; he should use the word "stationery," and he should give the amount. The gentleman created in my mind the impression that it might be four or five or six or seven thousand dollars; but we know it is only $125 for both stationery and postage. I make that suggestion only because the public might be misled.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman refers to abuses of the franking privilege by Members of Congress. It has been my privilege as a member of the House lobby investigating committee to give some consideration to those abuses, but the impression I gained from the gentleman's statement would lead me to believe that there were but few instances of abuse of the franking privilege. From the investigation I concluded there were only rare instances where Members of Congress permitted their franks to be used by civic associations in violation of the law, and I think the gentleman owes it to the House to make that clear, because some newspapers are only too inclined to pick up some little straw and magnify it in criticizing Congress. I recall years ago when serving as a member of the Committee on the Post Office and the Post Roads of this House the Washington Post carried an editorial charging that pianos and other freightable matter were being sent through the mails by Members of Congress under a frank.

The Committee on the Post Office immediately summoned the editor of that newspaper, Mr. McLean, before it, and we found that there was no warrant whatsoever for that charge. The charge had been made and it had gone broadcast to the public over the country. The public made up its opinion that Members of Congress were violating the franking privilege. It was not the fact. It was refuted, but the refutation did not reach to the quarters the original charge did, and Members are still under that obloquy. The gentleman this morning has stated that it is surprising the number of instances where the franking privilege has been abused. I think he should state, in fairness to the Members, the instances, as far as he can, and the number, so that the country may know that the Members of Congress generally are not indulging in wholesale abuses of the franking privilege. But the instances are few; that is my opinion from the consideration I have given to this question as a member of the Committee on the Post Office for 10 years and as a member of the House lobby investigating committee. [Applause.]

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, on the other hand, the gentleman from Indiana, did not say that there was wholesale violation. He said numerous instances had been reported to the committee, and he recited at least a half dozen or a dozen, without giving names, and I think they are sufficiently conspicuous to identify themselves in the mind of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not desire to have the gentleman mention the names, but I would like to have him state from his thorough investigation of this subject whether there are more than 10 instances where the franking privilege has been abused by Members in loaning their frank to civic associations or others.

Mr. BARNHART. I could not say as to how many instances there are. I only mentioned some of those that had been reported to the committee. These are conspicuous and pronounced instances, and I do not recall definitely—I think two of them occurred during the present Congress. The instances are past and gone, and in the course of my remarks I said that the interpretation of the printing law and the franking privilege, as they stand, was such that everyone put his own interpretation upon it; and, while there had been abuses beyond doubt, it is barely possible that those who indulged in them did not consider them to be such.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to say that as far as the law is concerned there is no question whatsoever in my mind that it is very plain and clear that no Member can allow his frank to be used for the dissemination of matter published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the benefit of any organization save one, and that is an organization composed of Members of Congress, that exception being made for the benefit of the respective congressional campaign committees. When the representatives of the National Association of Manufacturers, who had abused the franking privilege by scattering broadcast the speech of a learned Member of this House on a question of interest to the public——

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman mentions one that I omitted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Those representatives of the National Association of Manufacturers testified they were not acquainted with the law. The law is clear enough, and as I construe the law the Post Office Department, as the representative of the Government, has the right to proceed against every one of the violators of that law for the postage that would be required to be paid in the circulation through the mails of those speeches. There is nothing the matter with the law.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, the difficulty with the gentleman is that he is undertaking to assume that this committee is attempting to regulate the franking privilege. The Committee on Printing in this bill undertakes to do nothing of the kind, except indirectly. If the Committee on Printing can regulate the printing of franked envelopes and slips so that these abuses will be impossible, or if they are indulged in will be reported and given to the public by official publicity each year, we will have taken a long step in the direction of creating a reform and going probably as far as our committee could go, because if we went further we would invade the domain of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Therefore we have been careful on the line of demarcation as to how far this committee can assist the Committee on the Post Office in preventing the possibility of future abuses which we know to have existed in the past.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. FESS. For information, I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question: Suppose a Member of the House should make an address here, and I should want to use it under my own frank. Would there be any violation of the franking privilege if I secured the gentleman's address and sent it out under my own frank?

Mr. BARNHART. I think not.

Mr. FESS. Suppose an ex-Member of the House were to make an address outside of the House on some occasion and that that address were printed here by unanimous consent. Would it be a violation of the franking privilege for me to send out that address?

Mr. BARNHART. As I understand, the law provides you can frank out any parcel of matter contained in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. That is thoroughly established, I believe.

Mr. CANTOR. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARNHART. I will.

Mr. CANTOR. Does the gentleman's committee recommend any change in the present franking law?

Mr. BARNHART. No; this committee felt that it did not come within its province to make recommendation for any change in the franking law except so far as the printing laws can regulate; in other words, in making a violation of the law impossible. We thought we could go that far.

Mr. CANTOR. That is within the provisions of the law and act itself?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD and Mr. SIMS rose.

Mr. BARNHART. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bill proposes to revise completely the laws relating to printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications. Why should the Joint Committee on Printing longer be continued practically in the control of the administration of a Government establishment that does a business of $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 a year? Why should the Printing Committees of the two Houses assume to do any part of the administrative work in connection with the Government Printing Office any more than the Naval Committee the Navy Department or the Agricultural Committee the Agricultural Department? Why should not the Printing Office be managed by the Public Printer? If he be not competent, let him be removed, and if he be competent he should administer the office. Why should the members of the joint committee have authority to supervise contracts, supervise the administration, and do the innumerable things of a purely administrative character for which there might have been some excuse when the law was first enacted providing that Congress should have its records, files, and other papers printed, but for which no such necessity exists at this time with the progress and advancement in the printing trade?

Mr. BARNHART. Is that the question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I should like the gentleman to answer the question.

Mr. BARNHART. Well, it is very long, and covers quite a wide range, but in brief my answer would be this——

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a very important matter. For instance, the gentleman knows that when Congress is not in session the clerk of the Joint Committee on Printing, who always has been, as far as I can recall, selected by the members of the committee of the Senate, remains in Washington and assumes the control of the conduct of the Government Printing Office rather than have that done by the Public Printer.

Mr. BARNHART. On the contrary, the very reverse is true; the Secretary of the Interior has charge of the Government Printing Office when Congress is not in session; but going back to the other question——

Mr. FITZGERALD. He never exercises any control.

Mr. BARNHART. His business is to do it; that is what this bill seeks to do, to fix responsibility upon somebody.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The truth of the matter is that the clerk to the Joint Committee on Printing has the care of the public printing when Congress is not in session. Why should any committee, why should any Member of either House of Congress be engaged in the work of a great administrative department of the Government? Why should we not divorce the legislative branch, now that we are to revise these laws, from the control of an administrative department of the Government and let the Public Printer conduct the Printing Office. Under this bill as proposed he is a figurehead in most respects.

Mr. BARNHART. Oh, the gentleman could not put that construction upon it——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The fact is he is put at the head of the Government Printing Office, and yet there is not a contract of any character, not a thing that he can do himself, but the entire business is done under the supervision of six Members of the two Houses. With all due respect to the entire membership of the two Houses, I do not believe that any three Members of either House are as competent to conduct a great administrative establishment as the man selected for the work, who is a practical printer. If we are to revise the printing laws, laws in reference to the control of the Government Printing Office, it seems to me that a very pertinent matter to be determined is whether the Joint Committee on Printing, or each Printing Committee of the two Houses of Congress, should have anything whatever to do with the administrative work of the Printing Office, and that is a question to be determined in the consideration of this bill. There may be good reasons for it, and, if so, I shall be pleased to have the gentleman state them.

Mr. BARNHART. Now, if the gentleman will permit me here, the Committee on Printing finds that it has something to do. It believes that it has a right to assume some control over the affairs of the Government Printing Office. It has the responsibility for a good many things. The Committee on Appropriations, I believe, has all that it can do to take care of its special line of business, but the Joint Committee on Printing has charge, as I said in the beginning, of the expenditure of $7,000,000 of funds a year. Under present rule, as I said before, what is everybody's business is nobody's business. Things have been going along haphazard, and I realize, gentlemen, that these other committees are not quite ready to consent that the Committee on Printing of either House should undertake to regulate things which they—the other committees—believe are within their jurisdiction. We have understood that for some time, because we have encountered this opposition before, but on the other hand there is not any question, I believe, but what the Committee on Printing has a perfect right to bring this bill in, and as long as we do not infringe upon the rights of any other committee I believe we are performing a righteous public service. That is my answer to the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is not a question of differences between committees. As a Member of the House I have asked the gentleman to state, and I think it is a very pertinent and important matter, the reasons that justify a committee of this House; I do not care whether it is the Committee on Printing or any other—take, for instance, the Committee on Naval Affairs——

Mr. BARNHART. Just a minute. Who does the gentleman think ought to have supervisory control over the Government Printing Office?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the Joint Committee on Printing should have full control over the legislation affecting public printing. I do not believe that the committee should have any right, for instance, to administer the Government Printing Office any more than the Naval Affairs Committee should administer the Navy Department or the Military Affairs the War Department or the Committee on the Library the Library or some other committee the Bureau of Printing and Engraving.

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing is nearly as large an establishment as the Government Printing Office.

Mr. BARNHART. It is a different type of business and service altogether.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The head of that office conducts it under the head of a department, and no committee of Congress is attempting to determine the character of materials he should purchase, nor is he prohibited from making any contract or agreement or doing anything at all affecting the management of that office unless some joint committee of Congress approves it. We ought to divorce the administration of these great administrative departments from administrative control of Congress. We have legislative duties to perform. The Committee on Appropriations appropriates money, but it does not attempt to compel the head of any department or bureau to confer with the members of the Committee on Appropriations as to the expenditure of the money.

The gentleman speaks of the conflict of committees. For instance, section 32 of this bill, providing for the method of submitting estimates, is in conflict with the general law relative to the submission of estimates by all departments of the Government. There is another provision in this bill which makes a permanent indefinite appropriation for the Government Printing Office. There is another provision in the bill which authorizes the leasing of additional space upon the approval of the Joint Committee on Printing, regardless of certain other statutes controlling. There are a great many other things in this bill which put in the hands of the Joint Committee on Printing administrative powers which have no justification for lodgment in the hands of any legislative body. Why should not the Bureau of Fisheries be supervised, controlled, and conducted by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries? I ask in good faith if the gentleman will suggest any reason for the continuance of this policy, now that we have arrived at the stage we have in the art of printing?

A few years ago this House was confronted with the fact that a writ had been issued by the District Supreme Court to the members of the Joint Committee on Printing, bringing them into court to determine whether they should or should not execute a certain contract, because they were performing an administrative function. The question is likely to arise at any time. The Members of this House and of the other House, in the performance of administrative duties, are likely to be thrown into the courts and get into legal entanglements. Here is a great printing office, and why should it not be organized and administered by administrative officials and not by members of a legislative body. Everybody knows that Members of this House and Members of the other House have not time to devote to the conduct of the Government business reaching the enormous extent of $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 a year.

I should be glad to have the gentleman give some reasons. He may have reasons that I have not in mind that will justify this condition. I know no one else to ask if it be not the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York is generally fair and lucid, but when he undertakes to describe the Bureau of Fisheries as an important adjunct to the Congress of the United States he is surely very wide the mark. The Government Printing Office is really a part of the Congress in a large measure. It can not be any other way, because its mission very largely is to serve the Congress. We all admit that. Now, he says there is not any administrative feature to it as it now stands. On the contrary, there is a great organization down there, and under the plan proposed by the gentleman they would either have to report to the Committee on Appropriations or else not report at all, and so far as the finances are concerned the Appropriations Committee does take care of it, and in certain instances, in the not very far-distant past, it has gone down there without proper knowledge, because it did not have the time, and raised the wages of the different classes of workmen out of proportion with wages of other workmen in the Government Printing Office, and created disturbances that are not settled even at the present time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is intimating that something was done from which the inference is that I was responsible. The gentleman said that in the not distant past the Committee on Appropriations went to the Government Printing Office and raised salaries. The truth of the matter is the compensation was raised, if at all, for any employees, not by the Committee on Appropriations, but with the knowledge of every Member of the House, in items fixed in an appropriation bill.

Mr. BARNHART. It was done in a sundry civil bill, as I remember it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was not done by any committee; it was done by the House.

Mr. BARNHART. In any event, it was done, and doubtless the gentleman from New York had full knowledge it was being done, and I have no objection to the fact that it was done; but when you take one class of workmen, who are scheduled by the Bureau of Labor at certain wages per hour, and another class of workmen who are scheduled at the same wages per hour in the principal cities, and raise one class and leave the other one where it is you are creating trouble, and there ought to be some committee that has more time to give to the investigation of matters of that kind than a great committee that is overwhelmed all the time with other matters of even more importance.

Now, then, as to the organization of the Government Printing Office. I appreciate the fact that every Government head, and you all appreciate it, would like to have his own way. In the preparation of this bill we encountered practically the head of every department, who insisted that he must have his own way with what documents he should print and how he should print them. They all want all the leeway they can get, and I do not know as I blame them for wanting the largest privilege possible; but, on the other hand, there must be some stay somewhere, and it seems to me that it would be the part of consistency for the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], the chairman of the great Committee on Appropriations, to join hands with us and help regulate these abuses I have pointed out.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not objecting to the gentleman trying to regulate the abuses. I have asked the gentleman a simple question, and he has not come within a mile of answering it; and that is, Is there any reason why any committee of Congress should perform purely administrative duties in connection with the Government Printing Office?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly; in this instance; because the Public Printer is more the servant of Congress than any other man in official life. That is why it is our business.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman says he is the servant of the Congress. The Clerk of the House is the servant of the House, but no committee of the House attempts to perform his duties.

Mr. BARNHART. No; we are not attempting to perform the Government's duties.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman will find from an examination of his bill that he is not only attempting to provide for it, but to——

Mr. BARNHART. We are attempting to limit sole authority.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is in Statuary Hall a clerk known as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD clerk. He is an employee of the Government Printing Office. What peculiar reform is to be affected by the provision which provides that the Public Printer shall appoint this particular individual with the approval of the Joint Committee on Printing? The law provides that he shall be under the direction of the Public Printer. He is an employee of the Government Printing Office. He is now in the classified service. But here is a provision to fasten that place in the Joint Committee on Printing. It takes the position out of the classified service.

Mr. BARNHART. Well, now, Mr. Chairman, in reply to that I will tell him why the House ought to have something to do with this clerk in charge of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is because we are in direct contact with him all the time. He is our servant, not the servant of the Public Printer especially. He is the servant of the House and of the Senate, and especially of the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; not especially of the House.

Mr. BARNHART. He is our servant, and we have the right to assist in the selection of him, to approve or disapprove of his selection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. He is not especially the servant of the House, except that his place of business is perhaps nearer the House Chamber than the Senate Chamber.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I approve of the purposes of the gentleman's bill, and know that he is sincere, and all that. But as he is a newspaper man, I want to call his attention to a little matter, because there was several years ago reference made to a charge that a Member from Indiana had shipped 60 bags of seeds from Washington to his home city to be mailed out. The paper in which I saw the item stated that there was a carload of these bags. Of course the paper did not say that these seeds could have been franked here and sent out separately, which would have given the Government postal employees still more trouble than to have them shipped in bags direct from Washington to the Member's home city. But this same paper was a weekly newspaper and claimed that it had a circulation, deliverable in the county of its publication by mail, exceeding 1,000, and on that circulation, I understand, the paper does not have to pay any postage whatever. It was a weekly paper, published in the county, and it was sending out each week more than 1,000 copies of the paper, 52 times a year, which made its franking privilege amount to a much greater number of pieces during one year than the whole franking privilege enjoyed by a Representative of a congressional district. It was lamenting terribly over the abuse of the franking privilege by Members of Congress, and yet it did not mention at all the fact that it was itself exercising the franking privilege in the county in a volume nearly three times that of a Congressman.

It is complained that as an actual fact the Government loses about $60,000,000 a year on second-class matter, which is $60,000,000 lost on the franking privilege extended to these publications. I think these publications, when they abuse Congress, ought to be at least liberal enough to let the people know that they themselves are exercising the franking privilege in a volume vast in extent and far greater than that of the Members of the House.

Mr. BARNHART. Well, I will say to the gentleman that my experience is that there are a whole lot of consistent, sensible, and fair-minded newspapers published in the United States, and then there are others.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman takes his seat I want to ask him one question. This Government is founded on the principle of maintaining a separation between the legislative and executive departments. This bill proposes a combination in many respects, of the two in the administration of the Government Printing Office. Some of the men who help make the law are in many ways to execute it. Does the gentleman think that the reasons he has given are sufficient to confer all this executive power on the Joint Committee on Printing?

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman point out in what particular section of the bill it takes from the judicial department of the Government any of its rights and prerogatives?

Mr. COOPER. I said "executive."

Mr. BARNHART. In what respect?

Mr. COOPER. The bill gives directions as to how the law shall be executed in regard to contracts, and the Public Printer is bound to execute them in accordance with the views of the Joint Committee on Printing. The gentleman has pointed out many things that will be under the supervision of that committee.

Mr. BARNHART. I will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the section to which he is now referring is the existing law. This section is a very slight enlargement, indeed, of the present law.

Mr. COOPER. I was not referring to a particular section, but to many sections of the bill, some of which are new, I think.

Mr. BARNHART. I said in my opening statement that, in the main, this bill is a reenactment of existing law, because it has been found effective, efficacious, and helpful in the public printing service.

Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I hope the gentleman did not infer from my remarks that I, as a member of the Post Office Committee, was in any sense criticizing the bill. Far from it. I was merely trying to have the gentleman give the House a full bill of credit, that the franking privilege is not abused by Members of Congress generally. I was fearful that the remarks made by the gentleman might be misconstrued by the newspapers generally as a statement regarding a general abuse of the franking privilege. I think the bill as reported by the gentleman's committee——

Mr. BARNHART. I think if the gentleman from Wisconsin will look at my remarks when they are printed he will find that I very carefully avoided any such criticism, because it was foreign to my thought. I took these particular instances and cited them as a few of those that had been mentioned to the committee.

Mr. STAFFORD. I supposed the gentleman thought I was casting criticism upon him, but it was furthest from my mind to do so in that particular.

Mr. BARNHART. I did not understand it so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, speaking of the abuse of the franking privilege, as the gentlemen preceding me have just done, I am not sure that I am correct, but my recollection is that one of the Members of the House recently printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, under leave to print, a letter addressed to his constituents asking for a renomination. I know I have seen the letter, and my recollection is that it was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I have been told that that letter is being sent out under the Member's frank, with a picture of the Member at the head of the letter.

Of course, I suppose under the law the Post Office Department may have no authority to stop it. Perhaps it is not an abuse of the franking privilege. But I have always thought that I had no right to conduct a campaign or send out letters of any kind in reference to a renomination or reelection under my congressional frank.

There is a question as to the proper conduct of the Printing Office on the one side. The suggestions made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] that a printing office is an administrative or an executive office, and ought to be so managed, are of great force. Congress is not so situated that it is able to manage an executive office to good advantage. I do not think that any board anywhere makes a good executive. An individual ought to be at the head of an administrative work, and I have no doubt but that the Government Printing Office could be better conducted in its ordinary work if the Joint Committee on Printing had nothing whatever to do with it, so far as the administrative end of it is concerned.

That is one side of the question which must appeal to anybody familiar enough with administration and legislation to have gotten into this body. Everyone here must know that Congress does not make an ideal administrative or executive head. We do not even make a very good executive or administrative head as to our own work. We would be run in a great deal better manner, as far as legislation is concerned or as far as the administrative end of it is concerned, if we had somebody at the head to direct us. But as that is impossible in a legislative body, we do the best we can.

On the other side, I hold this bill in my hand. It is dropped into the basket by a Member of Congress to-day, and containing 125 printed pages, we expect it to be printed and in the hands of Members the next morning. The remarks I am now making will, without revision on my part—though revision might improve them—appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, which will be in the hands of every Member of Congress to-morrow morning. We could not rely upon having this bill, dropped in the basket to-day, printed and in the hands of Members to-morrow morning unless we had some control over the public printing establishment, originally known as the Congressional Printing Office.

I do not recall, if I ever knew—which I probably did not—the history of the beginning of the congressional printing, but I suppose that in the early days Congress found that it was necessary to control its own printing—which very likely was originally done by contract—so that it could determine that a thing should be done and done promptly and done correctly and have it under its own control. I do not believe it would be practicable for Congress to obtain from the Government Printing Office the work that it must have done for the orderly procedure of legislation if it had no strings tied to that work. How far the Joint Committee on Printing ought to pass upon the kinds of paper that are to be used and to pass upon the samples of paper and the kinds of ink and the samples of ink to be used upon all the contracts that are entered into for all the work of the Government Printing Office, which now extends practically to all of the printing done by all of the departments of the Government, I do not undertake to express an opinion about.

The distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] the chairman of the House Committee on Printing and the ranking House member of the Joint Committee on Printing, has presented this bill before us as a codification in part of the existing law and in part as an amendment to the existing law. The bill has been floating around Congress for quite some time. I do not now remember whether this bill was drawn to a large degree before the distinguished gentleman from Indiana became a Member of the House, but I think it was before he became chairman of the House Committee on Printing, and he is not entirely responsible for the matters that are in the bill, though I am glad to say I think we never have had a better, more conservative, more gentlemanly, and more courteous chairman of the House Committee on Printing than the gentleman from Indiana. [Applause.]

Now, this bill is one of details. The committee has not endeavored to reform the control of the Printing Office. That control is now in the hands of the Joint Committee on Printing. The committee may have intended in the bill to enlarge its powers and functions somewhat, but in the main the bill is one of details. As a rule, in examining bills that consist mostly of matters of detail I try to determine whether the man who drew the bill was careful about his details. When I strike a few places about which I wonder whether they have been carefully considered, then I wonder whether the whole bill has been carefully considered.

I call attention, for instance, to section 46, paragraph 2, page 42, of the bill. I shall not read the language of the bill, but the substance of it. It provides that of Senate documents and reports there shall be distributed to the Senate document room 300 copies. The language of the bill is in all cases "not to exceed," but that means the full number. Of Senate documents the Senate document room is to have 300 copies, and the House is to have 500 copies. When it comes to House documents, the Senate is to have 150 copies and the House 500 copies. The bill proposes to give to each Senator three copies of a Senate document, and to each Senator one and one-half copies of a House document. When it comes to House documents, it proposes to give to each Member of the House one copy, and of each Senate document one copy. Now, I am very appreciative of the distinction and honor of being a United States Senator, and I have the highest respect for that body; but I can not understand why you should print 800 copies of a Senate document and 650 copies of a House document. Of course, I am not a candidate for the United States Senate, and never will be, and perhaps the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART] is.

Mr. BARNHART. I take it I am not telling any family secrets when I say that in the hearings it developed that the clerks of the document rooms of the House and Senate agreed that it was necessary to have more Senate documents than House documents, because the House is very much more strict in what it permits to be printed than is the Senate, and therefore they have more calls for Senate documents in the House document room than otherwise would be the case.

Mr. MANN. Let us see about that. If the House is more strict about what it publishes as a document, then it publishes better documents on the average than the Senate, which is less strict; and yet the gentleman proposes to print, of these favorite documents, 650 copies, and of any old document 800 copies. I am afraid the explanation is worse than the original proposition.

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman will yield, this is virtually a reiteration of the present proportions, considering the enlarged membership of the House.

Mr. MANN. I do not see that that makes any difference. The original proportion was fixed many years ago, before the House or the Senate was of the same size that it now is.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARNHART. We took it that if there had been any serious complaint the superintendent of the House document room would have been aware of it.

Mr. MANN. If the superintendent of the House document room is not aware of it, he is more stupid than I take him to be. It is a common thing to send for a House document and find the number exhausted in the House document room, and have to send to the Senate to get the House document.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. RUCKER. In confirmation of what the gentleman from Illinois has just said, I have to-day on my desk four applications for documents which they tell me can not be had.

Mr. BARNHART. As a matter of enlightenment, we are now under present law printing documents for 391 Members of Congress, and we have 440, and, as a matter of course, the supply is low all the time; but this bill undertakes to provide for that. It provides for the enlarged membership of the House. The growth of the House has been enormous—something like 78 within the last 20 years, and in the Senate about 8.

Mr. MANN. The growth of the House has been considerable, but that was not known to the gentleman who drafted the provisions of the bill, because he has not recognized that fact. He has proposed no greater number of House documents to be printed now than was provided for before the increase in number. And, even if he had, no one but a Senator or a Senator's secretary would have provided for the printing and supply of as many documents for the Senate or a Senator as he did for the House. But let us see what it does. This is new. The House is to get 500 copies, and "upon the order of any Senator or Member at the beginning of each session one copy of every document for such session shall be promptly delivered to his office by the Senate or House document room, respectively, from the number provided therefor in this section."

Of course, each Member of Congress is not going to read these documents. Now, when he wants them he comes to the House document room, which receives 500 copies. It will be a very green Member of Congress having a very green secretary who, if this becomes a law, will not at the beginning of each session of Congress order the document room to send to his office a copy of every document published. That will take 435 copies of the 500 copies furnished. After they receive them they will pile them up until they get too high, and then they will dump them in the wastebasket. Then when a Senator or a Member wants a copy he will send to the document room, and the document will not be there. This is a new proposition. Without an increase in the number to be published, without an increase corresponding to the increased membership of the House, limiting the number published for the House document room to 500 and having disposed of 435 at one fell swoop you do not leave any in the document room for the benefit of the public.

That is not the worst. On top of page 43 it is provided that any Member can have every document sent to him from the document room during the entire session. This includes reports both upon public and private bills. Now, from the reports on public bills there are to be 500 copies sent to the document room, of which 435 will be distributed to Members. Of private bills there are to be 200 reports sent to the document room, and out of them the document room must distribute 435 to Members. That is a mathematical computation which anybody can engage in who desires. There have been a great many people studying for a long while how to make 200 in number reach around so as to give 1 to each of 435 Members, but nobody ever discovered the method until the joint committee reported this bill. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana to answer.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that the provision at the top of page 43 does not refer to bills at all.

Mr. MANN. I did not say that it did.

Mr. BARNHART. I do not, then, understand what the gentleman did say.

Mr. MANN. It refers to documents.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman said that we had provided for a certain number of bills and also provided that a copy of these bills should be sent to each Senator and Representative, and the provision does not say anything of the sort.

Mr. MANN. I have not mentioned bills, but I will later when I reach them. I am only calling attention to these matters, not for the purpose of saying that these are my criticisms of the bill, but for the purpose of testing the accuracy with which the drafter of the bill drafted it as to details.

Section 46, paragraph 5, provides that of House reports on private bills and of Senate reports on private bills they shall deliver to the office of the Secretary of the Senate not to exceed 10 copies. That is a perfectly legitimate purpose, but they do not give any to the Clerk of the House. If we have a private bill and report presented we send over 10 copies to the Secretary of the Senate, as we do also if there is a Senate bill and report of a private bill; the Secretary of the Senate gets 10 copies. But the drafter of this bill had forgotten that there was a Clerk of the House. It is just as essential that the Clerk of the House should have private bills and reports as it is that the Secretary of the Senate should have them.

Paragraph 5 of section 46 provides:

Of the Senate reports on private bills and simple and concurrent resolutions there shall be distributed, unbound, to the Senate document room, not to exceed 220 copies; and of the House reports on private bills and concurrent and simple resolutions, not to exceed 100 copies.

If it is a Senate bill and report, the Senate document room gets 220 copies. If it is a House bill and a House report, the House document room gets 200 copies. In addition to giving 220 copies of the Senate report to the Senate document room, we give the Secretary 10 copies; and then, having economy in our minds, when it comes to ourselves, we take 20 copies less for our document room of a House report than we give to the Senate, and we cut out the Clerk of the House altogether.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. I think I can explain that to the satisfaction of the gentleman from Illinois. I hope I can. I do not know whether he is making technical criticisms or not.

Mr. MANN. Of course I am making a criticism of the bill.

Mr. BARNHART. The inference that the bill has not been carefully considered by the present committee is a mistaken inference. The fact of the matter is the present committee had before it the superintendents of the document rooms of the House and the Senate and their chief clerks, and my recollection is that it was the superintendent of the House document room, through the very efficient Mr. Joel Grayson, who is so helpful to all of us, who gave us the information in many of these instances. Where large numbers of documents are printed, authorized by the House, there has been little or no demand for them; and he suggested the limitation; and, just the opposite, the superintendent of the Senate document room found that there was a constant demand from him.

The figures may have been slightly changed, but it was done upon the recommendation of these agents of the House and the Senate, who insisted that was the number of documents they ought to have to furnish the supply. For instance, in the matter of private pension bills the number printed are a burden upon the House side, and we have a provision in the bill to abolish them entirely until they are reported out. This because of the 100 that are printed the man who introduces the bill probably puts 1 in his file, and of the balance of the 100, 1 is sent to the man for whom the bill is introduced and the rest go to the junk heap. That is done in the House in such large proportions that our investigations led us to fix these numbers upon the basis upon which they are scheduled, and while some of them may not look right, I think that when we come to the consideration of the bill by paragraphs we will be able to show from the hearings that in the main the bill has been carefully digested and arranged, as I said in the opening statement, according to the evidence of the needs of the Congress, and which we ascertained from an examination of those whom we believe to know what is needed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to argue the question. If any gentleman's mind is so constituted that he believes that 98 Senators need 220 copies of a Senate report upon a private bill and 435 Members need only 200 copies of a House report upon a private bill, the matter is beyond argument. The mere statement of the case answers all that the gentleman from Indiana has said. Senators have no greater use for Senate reports on Senate private bills than House Members have for House reports on private House bills. I do not undertake to say what is the correct number, though I have been here and have seen superintendents of documents come and go, and have kept fairly well in touch with the documents and reports of both the House and the Senate.

Take section 47, paragraph 1, and we find the following provision:

There shall be printed of each Senate and House bill and resolution the number of copies for the following distribution: Of all public bills and joint resolutions there shall be distributed to the Senate document room not to exceed 300 copies, to the office of the Secretary of the Senate not to exceed 15 copies.

The Secretary of the Senate comes in in both places. The Clerk of the House is not recognized at all. There is no more need for the Secretary of the Senate having a file of these documents than there is for the Clerk of the House; but the Joint Committee on Printing—and this is my main objection to it—since I have been here has always been dominated by the Senate or a Senator. I have great regard for the Senators who have dominated it.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is always fair and instructive, and I believe that I can help him in this instance.

Mr. MANN. I am very much in need of help.

Mr. BARNHART. I will call attention to the fact that the provision to which he is now referring is practically a reenactment of existing law.

Mr. MANN. That does not make any difference to me.

Mr. BARNHART. The fact of the matter is the House committee made up its own bill, and we have many changes in the House bill from the Senate bill. These figures and estimates were made after we compared notes and had a meeting with the superintendents of the document rooms of the House and the Senate, with the result that they set forth that the estimates were the demand of the Senate, and that that was what they needed. Of course we then decided that inasmuch as the Senate would insert that in their bill anyway, if that is what they need—and I am in favor of letting them have what they need—that we might as well put it in our bill; but if the House does not need any more than was indicated to us, the Committee on Printing is not in favor of forcing any greater number upon the House.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Indiana is a little behind. He is answering an argument made some time ago and that he answered once before. Will the gentleman now tell me why it is necessary for the Secretary of the Senate to have 15 copies of every bill and not necessary for the Clerk of the House to have them?

Mr. BARNHART. That is for the reason that there is a different organization in his office, or so he sets forth to us, and that there was a demand for them, and that he had use for them and must have them to meet the demand.

Mr. MANN. That is childish. I would not say that of the gentleman from stating that, but if the Clerk made that statement, it is a childish statement. The Secretary of the Senate performs the same functions for the Senate that the House Clerk performs for the House. He has no more need of documents than the Clerk of the House, and I presume both ought to have and keep a file of them. The Clerk of the House wants these bills and ought to have them, and no provision is made in the bill for the delivery of any to the Clerk of the House; no provision in here, as I recall, for the bill to be delivered to the committee which has to act upon it, unless you get it from the document room. You take care of the Senate. When I was chairman of a committee they used to bring us—maybe we sent for them, I do not know, but we always had some copies of the bill delivered and always used to have from 15 to 25 or 30 copies of every public bill in the committee room. In addition to the number that would go to the members of the committee, there was always one copy of a bill to every member of the committee. You do not provide for doing that. You can not give every Member of Congress a copy of a public bill under the terms of this act. You do not make any pretense of taking care of the Clerk of the House, who has to have copies of the bill.

Section 50, paragraph 2, says:

SEC. 50, PAR. 2. Whenever any committee or commission of Congress shall have printed hearings or other matter relating to their official business, not confidential in character, there shall be printed, in addition to the number authorized for the use of the committee or commission, sufficient copies to meet the following distribution: To the House document room, 1 copy to be delivered to each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, and not to exceed 50 copies in addition thereto; to the Senate document room, 1 copy to be delivered to each Senator, and not to exceed 25 copies in addition thereto.

Of course that is an entirely new proposition. I can not imagine anything more grossly extravagant and unnecessary than that. We print hearings by the thousands upon thousands of pages. A Member of Congress who is interested in a particular hearing can obtain a copy of it from the committee room, or if there is an excessive demand from the public the House gives authority to print additional copies. But here is a proposition that a copy of every hearing before every committee shall be delivered to every Member of Congress. Why, you might as well say you will send the Library of Congress to each Member of Congress. What good does it do? It adds to the amount of money we receive from the sale of waste paper, because every Member of Congress every session of Congress will throw away a pile of hearings that would reach from the floor to above the top of his head, and he will not look at them at all unless he is specially interested; and if he is specially interested, he gets the hearings. Now, I do not know who made the estimate about how much this would cost extra, but I would like to ask my friend from Indiana, What is the estimate of the extra cost by the reason of the publication of these hearings?

Mr. BARNHART. I do not recall.

Mr. MANN. Very well.

Mr. BARNHART. The fact of the matter is the gentleman from Illinois has an entirely different conception of the meaning of this section of the bill from what the committee has.

Mr. MANN. Well, let me read and see whether there is any difference of meaning. It says:

SEC. 50. PAR. 2. Whenever any committee or commission of Congress shall have printed hearings or other matters relating to their official business, not confidential in character, there shall be printed, in addition to the number authorized for the use of the committee or commission, sufficient copies to meet the following distribution: To the House document room, 1 copy to be delivered to each Member, Delegate, and Resident Commissioner, and not to exceed 50 copies in addition thereto; to the Senate document room, 1 copy to be delivered to each Senator, and not to exceed 25 copies in addition thereto.

How anybody can have a different opinion of what that means passes my understanding. It is as clear as the English language can be written.

Mr. BARNHART. It is as clear as language can possibly make it that that restricts the publication of hearings. It sends 1,000 copies of hearings to the committee and then furnishes 1 to each Member of Congress, just as the committee intended to limit it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana is hardly correct in his statement to the committee. There is no change in this from the number of hearings now authorized to be delivered to the committee. This is in addition to the number which the committee receives. It says one copy to be delivered to each Member of the House. It will take quite a corps of men to deliver them.

Mr. BARNHART. I trust I am not intruding on the gentleman's time, but here is the situation which confronted the committee in the consideration of this matter: When 1,000 copies of the hearings are sent to the committee, ordinarily the members of the committee who are interested in these hearings and who participated largely in the proceedings find it convenient to broadcast this 1,000, and they then come back to the House; and I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I think possibly I have lost the good will of otherwise very excellent friends because it has become incumbent upon me, in order to hold these appropriations down, we have had to refuse them continuously, and sometimes there is absolute need; so it was decided by the committee, after a very full consideration, it would be better to send by mail to each Member of Congress a copy of the hearings, and if he chooses to throw them away that is his misfortune——

Mr. MANN. That shows good sense.

Mr. BARNHART. And if he wanted to send them away he could do so, but we gave the committee the 1,000 hearings that they now have to which they are now entitled. Hereafter we will only send one copy under the provisions of this bill to each Member of the House, and if the Committee on Printing has the backbone it ought to have it will end there.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, for a great many years I served on a committee of this House which, I think, had more hearings than any other committee of the House, and for a time I was chairman of that committee. The statement of my friend from Indiana that members of the committee sent broadcast the 1,000 copies of the hearings which were delivered to the committee is gratuitous and made without information. It is not the practice of committees to do that. It is not the practice of Members of Congress to do that. It is the practice of committees where they have requests from people indicating that they are interested in a particular proposition for the chairman of the committee to have a copy of the hearings sent to the list that is kept for that purpose. Now, that is a provision for a distribution of the hearings, and when the list exhausts the number that is allowed—the 1,000—then it is the duty of the Committee on Printing to allow more copies to be printed. Usually they have refused that during the last two years. Before the last two years under the law it was supposed that the Committee on Printing would order a reprint, and they would order a reprint when the 1,000 copies were gone. I do not know, but I presume you can still find in the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce some hearings taken before that committee while I was chairman of it and before I became chairman of it, which were preserved in proper method, so that they could be reached for distribution when anybody desired them, much more carefully than the Joint Committee on Printing preserves anything.

Now, the proposition is that instead of increasing the number when there is a demand for it, which goes to the committee which will have charge of the distribution and which will have the request, you are going to deliver to each Member of the House a copy of these hearings when you know that Members of the House will not read them, will not retain them, will only throw them in the wastebasket if the Members have any sense. A Member of Congress can not read all the hearings of all the committees in Congress even if he could extend his time so that he had 240 hours a day instead of 24 hours a day, and if he did read them all he would not know anything when he got through. He would be a driveling idiot. Those things he wishes to know about he keeps posted about, and he gets the hearings. But this proposition here is a pure waste of money.

There is one thing I want to call attention to, and this is not a criticism in any way of the bill. We print what we call "slip" laws, and it is a very common thing to refer to a law by the number that is given. Slip laws are given numbers, according to each Congress, and you frequently find a reference to a slip law by number, say "No. 241." You do not know whether it is this Congress or the preceding Congress or a Congress of 10 years ago by the number, and very often you find this is referred to by people who suppose that Congress has had sense enough to inaugurate a system by which you could identify a bill or a law by its number, but you could not identify it by its number. I asked the State Department some time ago—during last summer—as they make out the copies of the laws for printing, if they would not change the methods so that each number would apply to a Congress, and the slip laws are now printed as "number so and so," say, "Sixty-third Congress." Well, that was a very good reformation so far as it went, and I congratulate both the State Department and myself for having it done.

Now, we make no distinction, as a matter of fact, between a joint resolution and a bill. They both have the same effect; they both mean the same thing. One reads, "Be it enacted," and one reads, "Be it resolved." They are both approved by the President. They usually refer to a bill by the date of its approval. Unfortunately, no one yet has ever been born who could prepare an index that met everybody's mind. My experience is, and I constantly refer to the Statutes at Large, if you know the date of a law you had better look for it by the date than look for it by the index, because I very rarely find at the first place I look for in the index what I am looking for. And speaking of indexes, I may say the worst indexed thing I know about is the House Calendar. I do not know who is responsible for that.

Now, you provide for a different series for laws and joint resolutions, and when they are printed in the Statutes at Large the laws are printed according to the date of their approval, in consecutive order. You do not print the joint resolutions until you finish with the laws, and so the dates of the joint resolutions come in consecutive order and the dates of the laws come in consecutive order. A sensible method of printing is to make no distinction between a joint resolution and a law, but to print them all in consecutive order and number them all in consecutive order. They are all laws. You call one a "joint resolution" and you call the other an "act," but they both mean the same thing.

A gentleman came on the floor of the House here not long ago, to my certain knowledge, who had a reference to a law by date. He looked in the Statutes at Large under that date, and found there was no law under the date. He was looking under the acts. The reference was simply to the law, and he came on the floor of the House to tell me there was no such law. Well, having been caught myself that way years ago, I suggested possibly that the man who made the reference was accurate, and asked him if he had looked under the head of joint resolutions. He said he had not, but supposed that they were all printed together, as they were all laws. He came back afterwards and told me he had found this law along with the joint resolutions printed in a different place in the book than where it would have been printed if it had been an act of Congress, although it meant the same, whether it was an act or a joint resolution.

Now, here is an objection I have to the bill. On page 59 it says:

That all publications allotted to a Member in his respective folding room shall be taken by him within two years from the date of their delivery to such folding room, and prior to the expiration of his term of office, or the same shall revert to the superintendent of documents, to be sold or distributed by him, as provided for by law.

Now, that is a new proposition. At the end of the Sixty-first Congress there was passed a law giving to the different Members of Congress certain documents, which was repealed at the special session of the Sixty-second Congress. There has always been some conflict between the retiring Members and the new Members, but it has always been held, under the law, that a retiring Member of Congress had control over the publications in the folding room to his credit when he went out of office until his successor was sworn in at the beginning of the session of the Congress following. Now, I do not know why the Joint Committee on Printing has proposed this startling change in the law. Nobody here is asking for it. Just why should Members of Congress here legislate that when they get out of office they immediately lose the documents to their credit, and that the documents go to their successors who have not yet been sworn in? Of course, I believe in extending the hand of charity, but it seems to me that is a little too charitable.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. BARNHART. The gentleman from Illinois seems to proceed on the theory that these documents belong to the Members. They do not belong to the Members at all.

Mr. MANN. I will yield for an explanation, but not for an argument.

Mr. BARNHART. They belong to the districts and not to the Members, and if one Member does not send them out, and the district is entitled to them, his successor has the right to send them out, because they have paid their proportionate share for them.

Mr. MANN. They belong to the Member of Congress to send out. The retiring Member can send them out as well as the incoming Member. The gentleman has not given any explanation yet as to why he proposes such a radical change. I undertake to say to him that I do not think Congress is constituted of men so exceedingly foolish that they will make such a change. I do not know whether I shall go out of Congress at the end of this term or not, and no one else probably knows about himself, but I think that Congress is quite able, even if the Members are retired, to take care of their documents and franking privilege, as they now possess it, until the next session of Congress.

Nor do I see any reason why, if a Member has documents to his credit in the folding room, and is desirous of keeping certain kinds of documents there until he gets a set, he should be deprived of them at the end of two years. I have got some documents in the folding room that have been there for many years, where I endeavor to give a set to somebody who is interested in the subject treated, instead of sending them out as soon as I get them to Tom, Dick, and Harry, who may not be interested in the subject. But this proposes to say that at the end of two years—and no Member can know when the two years are up as to a particular document, regarding the date of its publication—he is to be deprived of them.

I must hasten along, because I see I shall not be able to finish all I desire to say within my hour. Section 57, paragraph 2, provides:

> The superintendent of documents shall, under the direction of the Public Printer, have general supervision over the distribution of all Government publications committed to his custody.

That is very similar to the existing law. I do not wish to complain about any of these officials. I have no doubt they do the best they can do. But the present system, while it may be economical, is not efficient.

Now, I am going to give you a particular case that is still on the table. On August 11 I received a telegram from the Dry Goods Reporter, of Chicago, asking me if I could have sent to them immediately copies of the Trade Directory of South America, another publication entitled "South American Markets for Canned Goods," and still another one entitled "South America as an Export Field." On receiving the telegram my secretary communicated with the Department of Commerce in reference to these documents, to know if they were available, and was told that they could all be obtained only through the superintendent of documents; that the directory would cost $1. We immediately communicated with the superintendent of documents, inclosing to him a form letter with $1, and asking that the Trade Directory be sent at once, as it was an urgent matter. Also the Department of Commerce sent the communication to the superintendent of documents, asking that the two other publications be sent to me. That was on August 11.

On August 12 the Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce sent me a letter in compliance with my request, as follows:

> DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
> BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE,
> Washington, August 12, 1914.
> Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
> MY DEAR SIR: In compliance with your request over the telephone to-day, the bureau takes pleasure in inclosing herewith a subscription blank for the Trade Directory of South America, and to advise that copies of special agents' series No. 81, "South America as an Export Field," and special agents' series No. 87, "South American Markets for Canned Goods," will be sent to you by the superintendent of documents, Government Printing Office, who has been supplied with a mailing frank for that purpose.
> Very truly, yours,
> A. H. BALDWIN,

That was August 12. My office does not stop with these things. We had communicated already by telephone. It was on August 12 that my secretary called up in reference to the matter and received this information. On August 14, not having received the documents "South America as an Export Field" and "South American Markets for Canned Goods" we called up the superintendent of documents in the afternoon and asked whether the documents had been sent to me. We were informed by the person answering the telephone that it was not possible to locate the order; that they could not tell whether they had received the order or not or whether they had filled it. We then asked whether the directory had been sent, in accordance with the order that had been forwarded, inclosing the $1, and the man answered that he could not tell anything about it, but would look it up and let us know.

The next day, the documents not being in the morning mail, we again called up the Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce and laid the facts before him. He promised to send the documents requested from his office and not wait on those to be sent from the superintendent of documents. My secretary asked the Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce if he did not think the delay in attending to this request was unusual, and was informed that it was the usual thing, that there was a great deal of trouble constantly arising about having documents sent out by the superintendent of documents.

On the same day, after we had called up the Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, at a later hour we called up again the superintendent of documents, and the man who answered the telephone informed us that the Trade Directory of South America would be sent to the party desiring it on Monday morning, August 17. This was on the morning of Saturday, August 15, and a letter had been sent to them several days before.

That is not the way we do business in my office; and my clerks, not being familiar with that method of delay, asked why it was not just as easy to send that document out on Saturday morning as it was to wait until Monday morning, notwithstanding the fact that the office closes at 1 o'clock on Saturday; why it would take any longer to send out the document than it would to answer the telephone and tell why it could not be done.

Well, my clerk did not get any satisfaction from the person who answered the phone, and, understanding the business, asked to talk with the superintendent of documents himself. That official very properly and promptly said that there was no excuse possible to be given, and that the document would be sent out at once, and that the clerk that had answered in the way he had would be "called down." I presume that was done; and very likely the Trade Directory, for which we had forwarded a dollar, has gone out. As to the two other documents that we asked for, first on August 12—what is the date of to-day?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. The 19th.

Mr. MANN. We have not yet received them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MANN. Now, I would like to have some gentleman who wants to transfer all this work to the superintendent of documents explain why it takes from August 12 to August 19, after repeated inquiries, to get two documents out of the superintendent of documents. Meanwhile I have gotten those documents from the Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, who is efficient, while the other office is entirely inefficient. [Applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the proposition I desire to take up for a few minutes has to do with an extension in the RECORD, and is especially in order in connection with the discussion of this printing bill. In addition to that, the extension in the RECORD has special reference to the circulation and distribution of speeches for campaign purposes, and that makes it doubly in order for me to discuss this matter at this time. The extensions I refer to were made principally by my colleague, Mr. HUMPHREY, on a leave to print granted him either in connection with one of his tariff utterances or under general unanimous consent to extend on the reclamation extension bill. I have searched the RECORD for his authority and have concluded that it was under this latter authority that he acted. I am not questioning his authority. The further extension by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] seems to have been under similar authority. I have not found in the RECORD where either of the gentlemen asked for permission to extend the particular matter, but, as stated, I do not question the regularity of the authority in either case.

The particular reference in the speech, or in the extension to which I have referred as making my remarks particularly in order, is one which lauds my colleague [Mr. HUMPHREY] as a Member of this Congress and urges his retention and inferentially the retirement of myself, because of the fact that his speeches made out of Congress are so popular and there is such a demand for them that they have very wide distribution through printing in the RECORD and distribution under Government frank. The statement referred to is as follows:

He has taken first rank in the debaters of the House, more than 75,000 copies of his speech at Indianapolis having been printed and circulated in various portions of the country.

These extensions in the RECORD are purely political propaganda, and they were preceded by attempts on my part to keep such matters out of the RECORD, as the facts will show.

It so happens that, by virtue of a legislative reapportionment in the State of Washington, it will be impossible for both my colleague and myself to return here after March 4, 1915.

On the 14th of last July, on the floor of this House, my colleague [Mr. HUMPHREY], without any challenge or provocation whatever on my part, suggested a criticism of my record. At that time I very much questioned the policy of injecting political controversies into the RECORD, and I still disapprove of such procedure. In accordance with those ideas, I made the following statement, which was incorporated in the RECORD of that day's proceedings:

I have planned to keep out of the debates or proceedings of this House any reference to the campaign between us as to the representation of the first congressional district on this floor. That is a matter for the hustings in my State. But in my colleague's brief reply to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] a while ago he threw down the glove before me, in a sense, by criticizing my vote on the tariff. * * * That glove I shall cheerfully take up at the proper time and place, which is during the campaign and in my district. "The proof of the pudding is in the eating thereof," and I have decided to put the matter up to him in the following manner:

My colleague [Mr. HUMPHREY] having in public debate this afternoon in this House referred to and adversely criticized my vote on the tariff, I invite the gentleman to meet me and as many of the people of the first congressional district of the State of Washington as care to attend at a public meeting at the Dreamland Rink, at Seattle, Wash., a hall with a seating capacity of 5,000 people, on such date in the month of September next and under such rules as may be agreed upon by Mr. J. C. Herbsman, the State chairman of the Progressive Party, on my behalf, and some other person to be named by my colleague on his behalf; provided, that the rules to be adopted shall make it in order for Mr. HUMPHREY to defend his own record on the tariff and other matters in Congress and to attack mine, and for me to defend my record and attack his; and provided further, that at the close of the last speech, without further delay, the question of who pays the expenses of the meeting—not to exceed $250—shall be submitted to the audience and decided by majority vote; the amount of such expenses to be deposited pending the decision of the audience by each of the speakers while the band plays but before the speaking begins. R. S. V. P.

HUMPHREY IGNORES INVITATION AND EXTENDS IN RECORD.

Up to this time I have received no answer whatever to this invitation. It is evidently the intention of my colleague to ignore it entirely. But that is not all of the story. If that were all, I would say no more here on the House floor.

Determined not only to ignore my proposition, my colleague and his friends have made almost unprecedented use of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, with campaign statements and voluminous arguments on his and their behalf. When these glaring statements are sent out under frank to the voters of the first congressional district—and I understand some 20,000 copies have already gone out, besides very extensive newspaper publications—I will have no adequate way of answering them, since it is plain that my colleague will not meet me as I have suggested.

For these reasons I am compelled to answer these statements, which contain glaring inaccuracies that must be controverted. Surely, a Member, under such circumstances, would be totally derelict to duty if he did not take such a course. It is not a matter now of campaigning for myself or against my colleague, but the rendition of a public service in correcting misstatements that will work great injury if not corrected.

On July 17, three days after my remarks, Mr. HUMPHREY inserted in the RECORD, under leave to print, four voluminous letters, addressed to Hon. W. A. Rupp, chairman Republican State committee, Aberdeen, Wash. One of these letters was from Senator WESLEY L. JONES, one from Mr. HUMPHREY, and one from the gentleman from Washington, Mr. JOHNSON, and one from the gentleman from Washington, Mr. LA FOLLETTE.

Following these letters came the platform of the late Republican State convention, held at Tacoma, Wash. In this series of letters each of the gentlemen were more or less complimentary of the other, carrying out the principle, "I'll tickle you, love, in your lonesome ribs if you'll tickle me, love, in my lonesome ribs." Mr. JOHNSON made this highly humorous reference to my colleague, Mr. HUMPHREY:

Show me—

Says the gentleman—

any New England or southern State that would call upon men like JONES and HUMPHREY * * * to even think of having to fight to hold the advanced positions which they have earned among the lawmakers of the Nation.

These letters and the party platform cover more than six pages of the RECORD, and if put into an ordinary pamphlet would make 20 pages. Just for pastime, I am going to quote a few selections from the pen of my colleague, so as to remind the Members of one of the leading traits of this gentleman, who, according to my other colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, would not "even have to think of having to fight for reelection if he lived in a southern State."

These selections are taken from the extension in the RECORD and from the Indianapolis speech made to business men and others, of which speech 75,000 copies have been printed at the Government Printing Office in addition to insertion in the RECORD:

Every day this Nation is going in debt more than a million dollars.
To-day 238,000 freight cars stand idle.
To-day 500,000 railroad employees are out of work.
To-day more than 3,000,000 men are idle, asking for work.
To-day the balance of trade is against us.
The business of this Nation has decreased a million dollars every hour that Woodrow Wilson has been in the White House.

In view of that statement, too extravagant for an Alice in Wonderland, the following, which may be termed a "Eulogy of a dear friend's political career," appears to be a joke rather than the sober statement of a profound Senator.

He [Mr. HUMPHREY] now has a national reputation and is everywhere regarded as an authority upon the questions of the tariff, rivers and harbors, merchant marine and fisheries, and the Panama Canal.

Yet, according to Mr. HUMPHREY's expert figures, the amount of the Nation's loss, occasioned by the Democratic administration, at $1,000,000 an hour, aggregates something over $13,130,000,000 to date, an amount nearly equal to the estimated actual cash value of all the railroad systems of this country, or about one-tenth of the entire national wealth of the United States. The great European war now going on is said to cost $22,000,000 per day, but my colleague says the Democratic administration is costing the people of the United States $24,000,000 per day in business depression alone. This great loss, if Mr. HUMPHREY is correct, in the past 18 months has been enough to run this Government for 13 years, or build 33 Panama Canals; more than half the national debt of the seven greatest nations of the world; more than $5,000,000,000 in excess of the entire estimated cost of the Civil War, including losses of private property and military losses as well.

Here are a few more gems selected from among many:

The incomprehensible stupidity of the administration.
The Democratic Party has deceived, betrayed, and robbed the people of the Pacific coast.
This Nation practically declared war against an individual (Huerta).

It seems to nearly break his heart that President Wilson has thus far succeeded in keeping us out of war with Mexico. It would seem that Europe would present to him a lesson and make him glory, as I do, in the fact that we have not yet gone to war with Mexico, and I hope we never will. Here is a part of what he said about that:

The world furnishes no parallel of our blundering stupidity in our Mexican affairs, and it is charity not to designate it by stronger terms.

Charity, he says, not to call it worse than "blundering stupidity."

But he goes on in the same vein, which would certainly be cause for alarm on the part of the Street Speaking Reform Association of Seattle if such language were heard on the public street. Listen to it and judge for yourself:

It will be a gainful day to this Nation when that prince of peaceful blunderers, that foremost of limelight lovers, once more takes up the poetic pursuit of filling his purse and feeding his longing soul on popular applause and again stands in Chautauqua's glad glare, in exciting contest with the yodeler, the acrobat, and the unadorned dancer, and leaves the affairs of state to subordinates or to happy chance.

I am glad to say on behalf of the people of Seattle and of Kitsap County, who compose the first congressional district, that the Secretary of State is loved and admired out there. Many differ from him as to political views, but all agree that he is an able and sincere man, and if Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington were to try to put that paragraph over to an ordinary Seattle audience he would have trouble with his audience, and yet one of these campaign documents, extended in the RECORD and signed by Senator JONES, says:

He has taken first rank among the debaters of the House.

But I will say that if my colleague had stopped with this abuse and the letters and platform I yet, perhaps, would have said nothing here, but would have waited till I reached my district to make my comments; but he did not stop there.

CONGRESSMAN LA FOLLETTE INSERTS A VERY LONG LETTER FOR MR. HUMPHREY.

Quite to the contrary, his friend and political associate, Congressman LA FOLLETTE, Representative, Member from Washington, placed in the RECORD, under leave to extend remarks, on July 18, pages 13468, 13469, and 13470, another very long letter from Senator WESLEY L. JONES on the subject "HUMPHREY'S work in Congress." The letter is written to a party whom I do not have the pleasure of knowing, Mr. J. P. Todd, and appears to be undated. In this letter the work of Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington in Congress is placed squarely at issue, and I am forced to discuss it or else allow those fulsome inaccuracies of a political associate to go to the people unchallenged and fully vouched for by the public record of the greatest deliberative body in the world.

SENATOR JONES NOT A VOTER IN THE FIRST CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT.

I desire to suggest here that the insertion of these various campaign documents in the RECORD, not only the various letters from each of the Members to the other, but the further letter of Senator JONES on behalf of my colleague, aside from what may be considered about the use of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, constitutes a unique and rather unusual precedent in this, that a Senator of the United States, who does not reside in the congressional district involved, would inject his opinion in this way into a controversy between two Members of this House as to which of those two Members should be returned to Congress.

I consider that that leaves the good sense of the Senator subject to criticism on my part, and I feel that it gives me the right and privilege to question his judgment. And in questioning that judgment I want to suggest in passing that only a few months back that same Senator took the position that William Lorimer was a good representative, and that he voted for William Lorimer as a Member of the United States Senate. So I suggest that when the Senator comes here, and through this RECORD, and through thousands and thousands of franked documents circulated and to be circulated in the first congressional district of the State of Washington, and through a hundred thousand newspaper copies published in that district, attempts to declare my colleague [Mr. HUMPHREY] to be a faithful and efficient public servant, and that he ought to be returned, and that I ought to be retired, he naturally submits himself to the question as to whether he is using the same measuring rod in judging my colleague that he used when he adjudged William Lorimer a faithful and efficient public servant.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. I will.

Mr. NORTON. I understand the gentleman is criticizing certain Members of the House for using the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for political purposes.

Mr. BRYAN. No; I am not. I am criticizing a United States Senator for using the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the publication of inaccuracies and false statements. As far as the statements are true, it is all right.

Mr. NORTON. And criticizing his fellow Members, Mr. JOHNSON of Washington and Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington, for using the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to send out and disseminate certain letters throughout the State of Washington. Is that right?

Mr. BRYAN. I am criticizing them; yes.

Mr. NORTON. Does not the gentleman recall that he as a Member of this Congress has used the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD just about as voluminously for that purpose as any Member of Congress, and does not the gentleman think that right here and now would be a good place for him to practice what he is attempting to preach and not use the RECORD in this way?

Mr. BRYAN. I will say that anything I have ever extended in the RECORD, or set out in the RECORD, is subject to an attack on the floor by gentlemen who speak, and I am willing to have the accuracy of any matter I am involved in brought in question and will not make any objection as to the jurisdiction or right of any Member to do it.

Mr. NORTON. Does not the gentleman think that the proper place to have such a discussion is out on the field of political battle in Washington rather than taking up the time of Congress here?

Mr. BRYAN. I did; but if I had extended this answer in the RECORD without attempting to present it on the floor I would have been condemned. My colleague saw fit to extend these matters in the RECORD, and I am going to correct inaccuracies, for I think it is my duty to do so.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman is going to do just what he criticizes others for.

Mr. BRYAN. No; I am going to tell the truth. [Laughter and applause.] Now, before I go into the real merits of the letter I want to take up a small feature of the letter.

The letter signed by Senator JONES divides the subject up into subheads, and near the end of the letter, under the heading "Attention to home interests," is the following:

Local matters. I think you know and everyone should know that no constituent, however poor or humble, however prominent or influential, has ever written to Mr. HUMPHREY that he did not receive a prompt reply and prompt attention to his request. During his entire service all these many matters have received his personal attention, and he has performed his heavy task ungrudgingly, feeling that it was his duty to do so.

In order to show that this indorsement is not warranted by the facts, and to emphasize the fact that it is not only William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State, who has been called nicknames by my colleague, and as a sort of balsam or consolation to the great Democratic leader I shall read copies of some letters written by Mr. HUMPHREY to Mr. Lloyd Armstrong, of Walla Walla, Wash., one of the "poor and humble" constituents back in the State of Washington, and a letter from Mr. Armstrong to Mr. HUMPHREY. I will say further that I am well acquainted with Mr. Armstrong, and know him to be a splendid citizen and a thorough gentleman. He is a printer by trade. The copies which I insert are as furnished me by Mr. Lloyd Armstrong, who holds the originals. I have not seen them, but if these copies are not accurate I shall cheerfully submit to correction by my colleague, although Mr. Armstrong has offered to forward me the originals. Likewise if my colleague desires inserted in the RECORD the letters he received from Mr. Armstrong, I will gladly give them space here or give my consent to their publication in the RECORD at any time or place desired. The first letter reads as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 30, 1914.

Mr. LLOYD ARMSTRONG,
24 Jaycox Building, Walla Walla, Wash.

MY DEARLY BELOVED: When I kick a mangy cur in the ribs I like to hear him howl. Waiting with pleasant anticipations for your next yelp, I am,

Yours, truly, W. E. HUMPHREY.

Eighteen days later Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington wrote as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 18, 1914.

Mr. LLOYD ARMSTRONG,
24 Jaycox Building, Walla Walla, Wash.

MY DEAR SORE-SIDED FRIEND: So my last kick landed squarely in your "slats." Really, I do hate to hurt a brainless pup, but I do enjoy your howls. Trusting that you will delight me with another yelp, and with most pleasant anticipations, I am,

Sincerely, yours, W. E. HUMPHREY.

The following is Mr. Armstrong's reply to the last letter:

WALLA WALLA, WASH., July 22, 1914.

Representative W. E. HUMPHREY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: A long time ago a prominent politician of the time was asked his procedure in his political speeches, and replied: "When I have a good argument, I present it calmly and convincingly; when I have no argument, I 'holler' and saw the air." In the latter event you use billingsgate.

Your letters have caused me much merriment, and you might continue them in the same vein. As they contain no information, I will not further reply to them. In any event, I have proven your unfitness for public life and your total lack of common cause with and contempt for your constituents.

You can change, if you will. Why not?

Yours, truly, LLOYD ARMSTRONG.

A subsequent letter to the same party, the copy sent me does not carry the date:

Mr. LLOYD ARMSTRONG,
Jaycox Building, Walla Walla, Wash.

MY GREATLY ADMIRED: I am not surprised to find that your yellow streak is equal to your howl.

Sincerely, yours, W. E. HUMPHREY.

The last of the series:

Representative W. E. HUMPHREY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your last letter says to me: "I am not surprised that your yellow streak is equal to your howl." Coming from you, that remark is very funny.

But let us see who has the yellow streak. Suppose that we appoint impartial investigators as a board to investigate the acts of both of us for any number of years back to the present; their findings to be general property. Are you game?

Replies must be in the name of a third party, as any from you will be returned unopened.

Yours, truly, LLOYD ARMSTRONG.

Inasmuch as Senator JONES, from his high and powerful position, permits the use of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in an effort to elect my colleague and to retire me, I feel it is my duty to answer these things and show that the statements by the Senator who found Mr. Lorimer to be a fit public servant are not correct, especially when he says Mr. HUMPHREY is so attentive to "each poor and humble constituent."

The following appeared in the Seattle Star, a leading independent newspaper of that city, a few weeks ago:

REPLY OF CONGRESSMAN HUMPHREY.

While brutal Cossacks in American uniforms are pitilessly riding down weak women and innocent children in blood-soaked Trinidad, ruthlessly cutting, slashing, and shooting them down; while monstrous onslaughts are made daily upon defenseless workmen who have the temerity to buck big moneyed interests; while soldiers are ordered to shoot and kill men because they are fighting for a bread-and-butter existence; while kind-hearted, whole-souled Mother Jones is kept in military captivity like the worst of animals; while the country is shocked by the brutality, inhumanity, bloodshed, and barbarism which holds reign in one of our States, Congressman WILLIAM E. HUMPHREY, of Seattle, complacently strokes his beard, draws his Government salary, eats his sumptuous meals, promenades along the boulevards, feasts at banquets, and, entirely self-satisfied, declares, "I should worry."

A few weeks ago Socialists at Anacortes sent a letter of protest to W. E. HUMPHREY, Congressman from this district, in regard to the outrages committed in the copper regions and asked for a congressional investigation.

After acknowledging receipt of the letter and resolutions, the statesman from Seattle has sent this reply to Miss Emma Sager, of Anacortes:

"It is my judgment that there has been entirely too much outside interference in this matter already."

A SNEER AT SUFFRAGE.

But it is not alone to individual constituents that my colleague writes his caustic letters, but by the wholesale he sneers at his constituents sometimes, as the following correspondence seems to show:

CONGRESSIONAL UNION FOR WOMAN SUFFRAGE,
Washington, D. C., June 20, 1914.

Dr. CORA SMITH KING,
The Olympia, City.

DEAR DR. KING: I am inclosing copy of a letter from Mrs. Norman Whitehouse, member of the Women's Political Union of New York. I have written her that I have forwarded a copy of her letter to you, and that you will do everything possible, I am sure, to induce a better attitude in Representative HUMPHREY toward the suffrage question.

Very sincerely, yours,

ALICE PAUL, Chairman.

The following is the inclosed letter referred to. Mrs. Norman de R. Whitehouse, who signs the letter, is the daughter of Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, a very distinguished woman.

118 EAST FIFTY-SIXTH STREET,
New York City, June 19, 1914.

MY DEAR MISS PAUL: I know your union is ready to fight the entire Democratic Party. Can you do something to one Republican Congressman? Last night, June 18, Mrs. Blatch was given a hearing before the New York Republican county committee. Her speech was, of course, excellent and very well received. The speaker of the evening was Congressman HUMPHREY, of Washington State. Mrs. Blatch had written to him asking him to mention woman suffrage in his speech, and I had telephoned to him to the same effect. He came in after Mrs. Blatch had spoken. When he began his speech he said he understood there had been a suffrage speech before he arrived, and coming from a suffrage State he would like to say that it did not cause dissension in the family. Every man voted the way his wife told him to and that made the end of it. The effect of this remark was most unhappy—a sneer at suffrage. I see the number of women eligible to vote in Washington is 277,727. Could not some of them be gotten to write and protest to him or do something?

Yours, sincerely,

VIRA BOARMAN WHITEHOUSE,
(Mrs. NORMAN DE R.)

Miss Paul then wrote Mrs. Whitehouse as follows:

JUNE 20, 1914.

Mrs. NORMAN DE R. WHITEHOUSE,
118 East Fifty-sixth Street, New York City.

DEAR MRS. WHITEHOUSE: I have sent a copy of your letter to Dr. Cora Smith King, of the State of Washington, who is here at the present time and who is treasurer of the National Council of Women Voters. I have asked her to have protests made to Representative HUMPHREY, and I am sure she will do everything that can be done in the matter. She is the most influential women that I know of with the Congressmen from Washington State.

Thank you for letting us know about Mr. HUMPHREY'S position.

As you doubtless know, we are having a deputation to the President on June 30, led by Mrs. Harvey Wiley. Would it be possible for you to join this deputation? It is called a deputation of club women, but that includes everyone, of course, as practically all of us belong to some kind of club. We do wish very much that you could come.

Hoping that you will be able to take part in this deputation, I am,

Very sincerely, yours,

ALICE PAUL, Chairman.

Dr. Cora Smith King's answer:

JUNE 22, 1914.

DEAR MISS PAUL: Thanks for referring to me the letter from Mrs. Whitehouse about Mr. HUMPHREY, of the State of Washington. I wrote the gentleman at once, as you see from the inclosed, which you are at liberty to send on to Mrs. Whitehouse for her encouragement. Will let you see what follows.

The gentleman from Washington doubtless conveyed his real opinion if he gave the impression of a sneer. He was wholly unregenerate on the subject when it was up before our voters, and is quite unreconstructed as yet, apparently. He was barely elected last time, and from current reports has little expectation of getting through this time. I will use this letter against him if he does not make a full recantation.

Yours, faithfully,

CORA SMITH KING.

THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF WOMEN VOTERS,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1914.

Hon. W. E. HUMPHREY,
House Office Building, District of Columbia.

DEAR MR. HUMPHREY: I am to-day in receipt of a letter from Mrs. Norman de R. Whitehouse, of 118 East Fifty-sixth Street, New York City, in which she quotes a part of your speech of June 18 before the New York Republican county committee. She says you said you "would like to say that it did not cause dissension in the family. Every man voted the way his wife told him to, and that was the end of it."

She adds, for herself, "The effect of this remark was most unhappy—a sneer at suffrage." She asks if the women voters can not do something about it. I am therefore writing to you, first of all, to warn you, in all friendliness, that it is not safe to joke about a subject that the whole country is taking so seriously. I advise and request you to write to the lady herself and make such amends as you see fit, by making some more constructive comment on the suffrage in our State, such as naming some of the good laws that have been passed since the women got the vote. If you have not this memoranda at hand and desire it, I will gladly phone or send it to you.

But please do something, and do it quickly, to remove the wrong impression you gave her. I will appreciate getting a report from you in the matter, since I am holding up my mention of this back in our State until such time as I might reasonably expect to hear from you.

Urging you to lose no chance to speak well of the working of woman suffrage in Washington, I am, with regards to your wife,

Yours, truly,

CORA SMITH KING,
Treasurer and Chairman Congressional Committee.

Mr. HUMPHREY replied to this letter with formal courtesy, but, according to Dr. King, the reply was merely a denial and was not accompanied by satisfactory affirmative statements.

Mrs. Emma Smith de Voe, president of the National Council of Women Voters, writes Dr. Cora Smith King concerning Mr. HUMPHREY'S position in this matter as follows:

I know he was opposed to woman suffrage during our campaign, and there is no doubt he has not changed.

Now, here is a United States Senator whose electioneering in a district in which he does not reside on behalf of Mr. HUMPHREY and, of course, against me, is inserted in the RECORD and made part of the proceedings of Congress:

I am pleased—

to comply with this request for a statement of the record of Congressman HUMPHREY, so far as it is possible to do so, and all the more so because of my continued service with him and because of our almost general agreement upon the important matters of legislation that have come up during the last 12 years.

The Senator refers to my colleague's labor record, and says it is something remarkable, or words to that effect; that he has been here all the time, working on behalf of labor, and he asks labor to work for him and support him.

THE TRUE LABOR RECORD OF MR. HUMPHREY.

I have secured from the American Federation of Labor the record votes of my colleague on matters of interest to labor. This data, which I now hold in my hand, shows his record and that of every other member of the Washington delegation, on propositions of interest to labor, and it is handed out by the American Federation of Labor without any partisanship whatever. It shows Mr. HUMPHREY'S position on various questions involving matters of interest to labor, wherein the Senator says he has generally agreed with him. I ask unanimous consent that this record, along with other matters, may be extended in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to insert certain papers in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. NORTON. I object.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, this is an insertion to which any friend of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] may well object. This record shows my colleague's opposition to labor in almost every instance. I am willing to give it to the public at any time, but I am not going to read it into the RECORD at this time, because its reading would consume too much time and there is something else at which I would rather use the balance of my time.

THERE ARE SENATORS AND SENATORS AND THERE ARE LA FOLLETTES AND LA FOLLETTES.

There appeared another comment on my colleague's record by another United States Senator, and perhaps the gentleman who just objected will not object to this being extended in the RECORD. It is a review of my colleague's record by United States Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, of Wisconsin. In 1910 Senator LA FOLLETTE published in La Follette's Weekly, under the head of "Humphrey system specialist," an article giving his judgment of my colleague's record as a record of service to special interests, voting with unvarying regularity the system's program. He declares that my colleague sold at his time and talents on behalf of these interests. He mentions the interests which Mr. HUMPHREY supported:

The shipping interest, the railroad interest, the Standard Oil interest, the iron and steel interests, the sugar interest, the textile interests, the smelting interest, the lumber interest, the coal interest, and the water-power interest, and all the other interests that together make up federated big business bound and riveted together by intercorporate ownership and community of interest and control.

The article written by Senator LA FOLLETTE's own hand continues:

In politics it is the representation of all these interests, organized in a common cause and cemented together by the cohesive force of public plunder. In politics the system uses its money to make "statesmen" and uses its "statesmen" to make money. Politics for profit is the slogan of the system and system interests. "Do you wish to invest in a Senator?" wrote Sibley to Standard Oil. So when a Congressman is representative for an interest he becomes by exchange of courtesies—through the logrolling that obtains in legislation, through the influence of legislation—representative for all the interests, for the system. Thus while HUMPHREY is primarily the champion of subsidies for the shipping interest, he is secondarily, but no less faithfully, the champion of all the interests and adherent to the Cannon system organization of the House. The RECORD shows him throughout his congressional service, when not giving himself entirely to his specialty of shipping subsidies, voting generally the system program.

A CANNON REGULAR.

The RECORD shows him an ardent "regular" of the Cannon machine.

The article continues. I would like to put it all in the RECORD, but I have not time to read it all. It takes up the record of Congressman HUMPHREY, with which Senator JONES says he generally concurred, and by example and instance on instance establishes his point that Mr. HUMPHREY was a system specialist. His article is divided into subheads. One title is "Killing the seamen's bill." Under this he shows Mr. HUMPHREY'S continued and persistent opposition to this meritorious and much-needed measure, and details his subserviency to the Cannon machine, instancing measure after measure. Yet Senator JONES devotes a section of his letter to make the very opposite impression. Under the heading "Man of political independence," Senator JONES says:

His political independence. He has the courage to follow his judgment, even against his own party. * * * While he is a partisan, he refuses to follow his party when its action does not meet with his conviction.

On another page of the same issue of La Follette's Weekly appears the following article:

WHAT HAPPENED TO HUMPHREY?

When something happens to a Member of the House of Representatives the Nation is interested. And rightly so. Congress makes the laws for the whole country.

At this moment the eyes of the people must be turned upon Congressman WILLIAM E. HUMPHREY. Something happened to him—quite recently.

HUMPHREY is a Representative from the State of Washington. Unlike most people in that State, he is a standpatter. He is one of "the faithful" in the Cannon machine. He is an ardent admirer of Cannon; at any rate he was on August 3. We have his own testimony as to that. Here it is:

"I believe in the obstinate integrity of that grand old man who for 36 years has held as with hoops of steel the confidence and esteem of his constituents and his colleagues, who for more than a generation has stood between wild extravagance and the National Treasury, who has saved this Nation more money than any other man that ever lived beneath our flag, who knows more about the wants and needs of this Nation than any other man in the Republic, who for years has borne his own sins and sins of every infernal coward in Congress, under whose leadership during the last eight years Congress has passed more important legislation than was passed in all the 30 years prior to that time—that grim old fighter that never asks quarter nor never gives it, the 'Iron Duke' of American politics—Speaker Joseph G. Cannon."

That was on August 3. Mr. HUMPHREY'S constituents may be pardoned for inferring from HUMPHREY'S remarks that there existed no hard feeling between Cannon and himself. Others who are not citizens of Washington may be pardoned for inferring the same thing. But many things may happen in the course of 19 days. For instance, a State like Kansas may leave Speaker Cannon a little the worse for wear after a face to face encounter. And States like Iowa and California may enter a vehement protest against Cannonism. And the big party bosses may hasten to sacrifice a man like Speaker Cannon in the interest of "party success." And little bosses all over the country may take their cue from the big bosses and desert their erstwhile czar and master. All these things may happen between the 3d of the month and the 22d of the month. Certain it is that something happened to HUMPHREY during this time. We have the evidence from his own lips. On August 22 he unbosomed himself to his constituents as follows:

"While I have had no official information upon the subject, press dispatches in the last few days have announced that Mr. Cannon would be a candidate for the Speakership of the next House of Representatives. I do not believe that he will be, however. I have waited several days for an authoritative denial from him, but he has not seen fit to make one. This action on the part of Mr. Cannon, which I regret very much, makes me feel that it is my duty to state publicly what my closest political friends have known for more than a year; that is, that I did not think it to the best interests of the Republican Party for Mr. Cannon to be a candidate for Speaker of the Sixty-second Congress; and if he was, that I would not support him. So long as he made no announcement I felt I should make no statement in regard to the matter.

"I have never attempted to conceal my attitude upon any public question from the people of my district, and I shall not do so upon this matter."

Let us not pause here to reflect upon the frailty of human devotion. Let us pass over HUMPHREY'S magnanimity in thus taking his constituents into his confidence. Let us not indulge in superfluous remarks concerning the awful designs upon his friend and patron—Cannon—that he hid in his heart, and the hearts of his closest political friends, for a whole year; designs that he cherished in secret while he gave vent to fulsome eulogies in public. Let us not yield to any of these obvious temptations to moralize. Let us rather seek an answer to a question. It is this: What happened to Congressman HUMPHREY?

I want to suggest that Senator LA FOLLETTE also took an entirely different view of Senator Lorimer, who is now under indictment, I understand, in connection with his bank failure, and came to a different conclusion from Senator JONES on this matter, too. Senator LA FOLLETTE thought that Lorimer was entirely unfit, and voted to expel him from the Senate. Is it possible—I am not going to say it is a fact—but is it possible that this difference of view had something to do with the entry of Senator JONES into this campaign for Mr. HUMPHREY and against me? I would not have referred to these matters or brought them up on the floor if the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and the leave to print had not been used to circulate the letter of Senator JONES.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I raise the question of order—that the gentleman is out of order in referring to a Member of a coordinate branch and criticizing his actions. Nothing is more violative of the rules than that a Member of the House should refer disparagingly to a Member of another coordinate body.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I am reading from La Follette's Weekly, a newspaper published at Madison, Wis.; and when I was reading a while ago from a letter——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, a question of order. The gentleman was not reading from La Follette's Weekly. He was criticizing by name a Senator of the United States, and he had not any right to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken, and the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I shall continue to proceed in order, as the Chair has directed.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, one moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to enter into this controversy at all. I do not know anything about the merits of it one way or the other, but is it out of order—because this is establishing a precedent here—if a United States Senator writes a private letter in my district and the letter is put in the RECORD for me to refer to that letter and to the Senator because of that act? I thought the matter of privilege went only to the Senator and his rights as a Senator and what he says on the floor of the Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Wisconsin is right, and yet the Chair will hold that the criticism of a Member of the Senate on the floor of the House broadly was not within the rule.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest to the gentleman that I did not say that Senator JONES did anything wrong in voting for Lorimer. I merely said that he did it. That may be one of the proudest acts of his life. Mr. Lorimer met with his approval; so did Mr. HUMPHREY. I only asked if it was possible that he was measuring my colleague by that same measure. I did not say that he did anything wrong. It is the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] who gets up and flies to the defense of Senator JONES, and says that I have accused him of doing something very wrong. It is he who condemns the Senator. I did not condemn him.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman knows full well that his only purpose is to besmirch Senator JONES. Why has he not the courage to say so openly?

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman is as false as he is tall, and he is a 6-footer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I call the gentleman to order, if nobody else does.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman ought not to have made his statement, and I am willing to extract mine from the RECORD.

Now, gentlemen, I have about finished, although there are some brief documentary matters that I should have the right to extend in the RECORD—I want to say, as I said at the outset, the only occasion, the only reason why I inject this matter into the RECORD is because these voluminous letters by these gentlemen, and the copy of the platform, and especially this letter of Senator JONES has gone out in large numbers into my district, and I do not believe there is a fair man on this floor who will not realize that it is only legitimate and straightforward for me to answer at the same tribunal a matter——

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. In a moment—a matter that was put in the RECORD, and practically every work that was placed in the RECORD by my colleagues was placed in there under leave to print on the state of the Union, or some general unanimous consent. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CLINE. I want to inquire of the gentleman from Washington whether he assumes there is an understanding between Senator JONES, of Washington, and Mr. HUMPHREY, of Washington, that the Senator shall assist Mr. HUMPHREY in his canvass of his district, and that is the reason why these letters have been inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. BRYAN. There is no question of their being confederates and associates in this political enterprise. They expect to help each other.

Mr. CLINE. I ask the question for the reason that if it appears that there was any confederation shown or intimated by the gentleman from Washington, and if his colleague from Washington and the Senator sought the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the purpose, then the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is clearly right in answering here.

Mr. BRYAN. I will risk that proposition, all right. They can not have exclusive use of the RECORD. It is a poor rule that will not work both ways. The letter of Senator JONES recommended earnestly the retention of Mr. HUMPHREY in Congress, and, of course, my retirement.

I will state further that I have also the roll call from Collier's of my colleagues votes for a long time back, and if there is anything left unsaid or any document or article I have referred to that my colleague would like to have inserted in the RECORD I am prepared to insert it.

I much prefer him to accept my proposition, however, and refrain from extending campaign letters in the RECORD, but meet me out in the State of Washington along in September, when we both can get an opportunity to present these matters to the voters. I agree that these things ought not to be presented here, but when a Member does put things in the RECORD, when a Member does extend his letters and documents and put matters at issue, as was done in this case, it puts me in such a position as to make it necessary to adopt this means of meeting it. I have only inserted part of the La Follette's Weekly article; the rest of it I will insert if my colleague wants it and unanimous consent is given; or if he wants to meet me out at Seattle we will read the article to the people and let him answer it in person or through Senator JONES. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. UNDERWOOD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore a message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 11740. An act to amend an act entitled "An act creating a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska and conferring legislative power thereon, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912; and

H. R. 92. An act to extend the general land laws to the former Fort Bridger Military Reservation, in Wyoming.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 6282) to provide for the registration of, with collectors of internal revenue, and to impose a special tax upon all persons who produce, import, manufacture, compound, deal in, dispense, sell, distribute, or give away opium or coca leaves, their salts, derivatives, or preparations, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. SMOOT as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5739) to present the steam launch Louise, now employed in the construction of the Panama Canal, to the French Government.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5977) to authorize Bryan Henry and Albert Henry to construct a bridge across a slough, which is a part of the Tennessee River, near Guntersville, Ala.

REVISION OF PRINTING LAWS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am not going to talk about the printing bill. I am going to leave that to my friends, Mr. BARNHART, Mr. FITZGERALD, and Mr. MANN. I think it is in good hands and we will work out a proper bill in that regard. I am not going to talk about politics either. I have up to date neither Bull Moose nor Republican opponent, and I hope I will not have; and therefore that matter is of no burning importance yet, and I hope will not be. But I do want to talk about, for a little while, gentlemen, the proposition that is of live interest to the people of America and especially to the people of the United States to-day. Nothing is nearer, not the heart, but the pocketbook of the American people than the high cost of living, and to show the interest that the people have in that subject to-day, there is not a district in the United States and not a city in the United States wherein an investigation of this subject is not being carried on by Federal or local authorities or both. I became interested in this matter more than a year ago, and for quite a while I have been investigating why it was that there was such a great difference between the prices that are received for their wares by the producers of such wares and the prices that are demanded of the consumers of those same wares. It was with this end in view that about a year ago, or a little less, I introduced into this House a bill regulating cold-storage warehouses throughout the United States engaged in interstate commerce. This question, I want to say to the committee, is not a new one. It has been investigated before. In 1910 and in 1911 special committees of the Senate and special committees of the House investigated the subject, with the result that on March 3, 1911, a bill was reported out. A committee of the Senate, presided over by the late Senator Heyburn, held extensive hearings on this subject, and unanimously reported a bill to the Senate regulating cold storage in this country. That bill did not become a law.

The bill that I have introduced in the House is along the same lines of the bill introduced and recommended in the Senate by the committee presided over by the late Senator Heyburn. Last fall, when this bill was introduced, it created great public interest, for the reason that there were certain commodities, notably eggs, the prices of which had gone to remarkable heights. But later on, when the supply in the spring became greater, the interest in the question dropped to some extent; and, in the next place, while the bill was pending before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce the President desired to have the antitrust bills considered by that committee, and the hearings on my bill were postponed until recently, when short hearings were held, but have not been completed as yet.

Since the war in Europe has broken out, gentlemen of the committee, interest in this matter has again become acute, and ought to be acute. These investigations are being carried on now for the purpose of determining who are to blame for the remarkable increase in prices, and I want to discuss that feature of the case with you.

This bill provides that certain meats used every day in every family and every household shall be kept in cold storage only a limited time. What for? For the purpose of preventing the packers who are in combination from demanding exorbitant prices for those meats. Just to show you how concerned the great body of the plain people are on this subject, I am going to read, with his permission, a letter that my friend Representative EAGAN handed me a moment or two ago, not knowing at the time that I intended to discuss this subject this afternoon. I say I read it for the purpose of showing that this is a question that reaches every family in the country, the poor and the rich alike. And the appeal that is given here shows that in a more effective way than I can talk about it. It says:

HOBOKEN, N. J., August 15, 1914.

Hon. JOHN J. EAGAN.

DEAR SIR: I think that I have a very good way of solving the high cost of living by the Congress and United States Senate getting together and immediately passing a bill that will not allow the cold-storage houses to keep meats of any kind or vegetables or anything perishable longer than 15 days; anything kept over the limited time will be sold by the Government and the owner of storage houses and owner of goods sent to jail for not less than 7 years nor more than 20 years without a fine. It will only take about one week to pass a law like this if the Congress and Senate get busy.

Hoping you will oblige a poor mother with 10 children,

Respectfully,

MRS. MEYER,
221 Madison Street, Hoboken, N. J.

[Applause.]

You will find in the hearings here that have been printed letters and editorials from every State and every congressional district in this Union in approval of the cold-storage bill that has been introduced into this House by me. Innumerable letters from every portion of the country, innumerable editorials from almost every paper of any importance in this country, and, with four exceptions, as I now recall, every one of them demanding of Congress or asking of Congress or pleading with Congress to pass such a measure. Why? It is just as simple, gentlemen, as that two and two make four. We know, whatever else may be said, that the packing-house interests in this country absolutely control the prices of meat.

They fix them on one day in every week in every town and every city in this country, not by the law of supply and demand, but because we have in cold storage as it is now managed an instrument here which enables them to disregard any such law of supply and demand. But they merely have their agents, who on every Thursday morning, I am told, in the city of Memphis, where I live, meet and say that the price of meats shall be thus and so for the following week. And every butcher, every dealer in that city, must sell it at that price and at no other price.

Talk about monopoly! Talk about combination! Gentlemen, that combination or that monopoly that will thus control the price of the very necessities of life is the most outrageous, the most unjust, and, in my judgment, should receive from this Congress its earliest disapproval. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman and gentleman, I say they control it. This bill provides that the United States Government shall have the right to inspect packing houses in this country. Do you imagine it has any such right now? Why, it has no more right to-day than it has to go into your pocket and inspect how much money you have got. Meat for the most part is a subject of interstate commerce; packing houses do almost an exclusive interstate business, and not a line or a syllable in the law passed by this Congress for their regulation. Subject to State regulation? Yes. But we know how that is done. Very few of the States regulate them, and they have become so powerful and so proud that they have no respect for either the State authorities or for the national authorities, and the way they treated our friend, the late Senator Heyburn, of Idaho, was simply outrageous in the extreme. I do not think I could better show you just the way they did him and his committee than by reading a letter or two from Mr. Armour and from Mr. Swift.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman permit a question there?

Mr. McKELLAR. I certainly will.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly. I would prefer if the gentleman would permit me to go on now——

Mr. CLINE. It is very brief.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. CLINE. I wanted to inquire whether the gentleman would go to the extent of authorizing some governmental agency to fix a maximum price under any conditions?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no. That is not a governmental function at all. What we want to do is to regulate them, so that the law of real supply and demand will influence and control their actions and not just the question of their greed, the question of how much they will take. And to illustrate what I say, let me mention——

Mr. BRYAN. The practice obtains with respect to many products besides meat—products that are not affected by the cold-storage proposition?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but the gentleman would be surprised to know how many products are absolutely controlled by the cold-storage companies and packers. How many would the gentleman say? A dozen or a half dozen? Oh, no. There are in the neighborhood of 300 products in this country, the price of which, the control of which, depends upon these warehousemen and these packers, with no Government control over them; and I will take the time right here to show you why control is so necessary. If a man has 100 beeves in his pasture, he, the producer, has got to sell them. Why? If he does not, they will eat their heads off. So they are killed and put in cold storage and kept for 6 months, 12 months, 18 months, 2 years, 3 years, or 5 years, as the case may be. Why? Is that packer in the same position as the producer? Oh, no. The producer has to sell or the cattle eat their heads off. But it is different with the packers. It costs only a fraction of a cent to keep that meat in cold storage indefinitely; and the packer, practically speaking, without cost to himself, can put that meat on the market whenever he pleases, and there is no man to say him nay, and unfortunately no law under which he may be regulated.

When, however, you fix a limitation, depending on the nature of the commodity that is kept in cold storage, when you fix that limitation upon him, what does it do? It puts him again under the control of the law of supply and demand, because he can not keep it longer than that; and when you have done that, then it is that you have to investigate him and keep track of that. And that is just what this bill provides for—the investigation of it.

Why, they tell me that they put any kind of beef into cold storage—good beef, bad beef, indifferent beef, all kinds of beef, and all kinds of hog products in cold storage. A great many people do not know but what cold storage rather helps articles put in cold storage. Well, cold storage merely keeps it in the same condition it was in when it was put in. They do this without regulation. Why, gentlemen, we ought to have a law that will force these packers and warehousemen to submit their products to examination by Government officials when their products are intended to go into interstate commerce, to see that the food that the American people have to eat shall be pure and fit to be eaten.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to inquire if the gentleman has investigated as to the character of the preservatives used by the packers?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. They use all kinds of preservatives; some that are good for the human body when taken into the system, and others that are not. But I will say to the gentleman that as long as these packers absolutely refuse to give any information about their management, and about the management and control of their systems of packing, it is impossible for the Government to have any accurate knowledge or information about it, and the only way you can get it is to investigate by piecemeal. And I want to say to the gentleman that where I got my information was through examinations that were made not only by Senator Heyburn's committee, but from other examinations that were made by committees of various State legislatures. And you will be surprised to know that there are eight States in the Union now that have cold-storage laws. Does that answer the gentleman?

Mr. FOWLER. I will ask the gentleman if he has conferred with Dr. Wiley and ascertained the results of his examinations into this question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have. Dr. Wiley, however, has not gone as thoroughly into the meat question as he has gone into other phases of the general question, notably as to eggs. But Dr. Wiley is one of the most distinguished chemists, or agricultural chemists, whatever you might call the man who makes investigations of that kind; certainly he is a great authority. This bill is based to a very large extent upon the report of Dr. Wiley as furnished in the hearings.

Mr. FOWLER. He says they are using benzoate of soda and sulphides, both of which are very injurious to health.

Mr. McKELLAR. They do; and that is being constantly done.

Now, under the provisions of this bill it is provided that the Government should investigate and see how these meats are prepared and kept; whether they are good when they go in; whether they stay in there longer than the time allotted to them under the law. And the figures that are produced in this bill—which I need not go into—have been carefully drawn, and scientifically drawn. They are not of my drawing, and I am depending upon the expert testimony of witnesses who have been produced before the hearings, and the length of time is virtually the same as is prescribed in the bill that was favorably reported in the Senate.

But I want to talk about the packing interests for a few minutes, and of their absolute contempt for Congress on this subject. Senator Heyburn's committee was directed to go to Chicago and summon the packers before it. That committee went out there, and here is what occurred. I will read some letters. They are short. Here is a letter that was sent out on May 20, 1910:

MAY 20, 1910.

Mr. ARTHUR MEEKER,
Care Armour & Co., Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Senate bill 7649, introduced as a result of the inquiry that is being made by a special committee appointed by the Senate to investigate the high cost of living, has been the subject of hearings before the committee. A number of representatives of those who conduct cold-storage plants, as well as chemists, have appeared before this committee and furnished information in reference to the alleged unwholesomeness of food kept in cold storage. By reason of your familiarity with the cold-storage business you could probably furnish valuable data which would be of interest and value to the committee in determining what action should be taken on the measure. Will you kindly indicate if you are willing to appear before the committee when a date will be set for the hearing?

Very truly, yours,

_____.

Certainly a very genteel request to appear before the committee; nothing that Mr. Meeker, the representative of this great packing interest, could object to. Here is what he says:

MAY 24, 1910.

Hon. W. B. HEYBURN,
Chairman Committee on Manufactures, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I beg to acknowledge receipt of your courteous invitation to appear before the special committee appointed to investigate the high cost of living. I would gladly appear if I thought I could furnish any information that would be of value to the committee, but I have no special knowledge on the subject.

Thanking you, I am,
Very truly, yours, ARTHUR MEEKER.

Swift, Armour, every other packer, received the same courteous invitation to appear before the committee, and there was not a single packer that had the slightest knowledge, according to the replies. Senator Heyburn's committee went to Chicago and came back, and not a packer appeared before that committee to testify in any manner whatsoever.

Now, gentlemen, of course they did not do it. Why? The testimony of this record shows that they make an enormous per cent—they are middlemen—by reason of being able to buy the products at a low figure, because the producer is obliged to sell the cattle or let them eat their heads off, and then the packers hold them for practically nothing, or at nominal expense. They make enormous profits in many cases, including the profit derived from the products and the by-products.

Now, I am not going to argue against cold storage. It is one of the great discoveries of this country or any other country. Used properly it is a great boon to mankind. A man would be an idiot not to know that cold storage properly used is a great thing for our country. But what I am decrying against is its use as an instrument of oppression of all the people of the country as it is being used this day, simply to multiply almost without limit the profits of the middleman. The many fortunes that have been made by these packers simply because they have in cold-storage an instrument which they use for the oppression of the people and for their own profit all the way down the line are a by-word in this country. They are entitled to reasonable profits; no one denies that. But they ought not to be permitted to rob. You saw an example of it about a week ago. For a few days they have been trying to backtack, but as soon as an excuse arose they raised the price. Did they wait until the law of supply and demand could operate? Everybody knows that if this European war continues long enough it will raise the prices of certain food products. But they did not wait for that. They found an excuse and promptly accepted it by raising the prices of everything that we have to eat in this country. Cold-storage products went up first. It is just an excuse. There is no real reason for it.

Now, gentlemen, what is the practical thing to do? As I say, the demand for this legislation is almost universal in this country. Every gentleman on this floor, whether Democrat, Republican, or Progressive, unless he represents a district in which there are large packing houses, is in favor of this legislation. And even in those districts the great majority of the people, including everyone who has a family, demands this legislation. If you do not believe it, get the hearings and see the communications from your districts. I doubt if there is a man here who will not find a letter printed in those hearings from some constituent demanding the passage of this law. If you are not satisfied with that, read the editorials from your district that are found in the hearings—well-considered editorials written by men who are familiar with the subject, men who are accustomed not to speak lightly; men who have given the matter careful consideration; men who know what conditions are.

You will find there editorials from every congressional district in this country from your leading papers. I do not care where you come from, whether from California or Maine, from the South or from Brother DONOVAN'S district in Connecticut, you will find them everywhere demanding that this legislation be passed. If you still have doubts about the wisdom of passing this legislation, then I ask you to go to your own State law, and what do you find? You will find that New Jersey, New York, Massachusetts, Indiana, Kansas, California, and several other States have already passed cold-storage measures. Many others are trying to pass them. I want to tell you about those cold-storage measures passed by the States. If you will examine the statutes of the various States as found in the hearings you will find that in practically all of them the cold-storage people, the packers and the warehousemen, have secured modifications which are satisfactory to them. By the way, in this controversy there are two distinct sets of people who control the market. One is what are called the independent warehousemen; the other is the packers. And to show you that it is a big thing, gentlemen, the independent warehousemen alone have got $3,000,000,000 invested in cold-storage plants and management in this country. They control only about 40 per cent, or perhaps 35 per cent, of the cold-storage products of the country. The other 60 or 65 per cent are controlled by the packers, and we do not know how much they have invested. We can not tell. They will not tell. We can not get them before us. They treat the committees of the Senate and the House with contempt, because they know that whenever they have to stand under the glare of publicity they are going to lose their profits and the people are going to be benefited. That is why they do not come. That is why they treat these committees with contempt, and there is but one way to get at them. The State regulations are inefficient. But whenever the great Government of the United States lays its hand on them and says, "You must do right," they will come across and do right, and every man, woman, and child in this country will be benefited.

Why, gentlemen, the records here show—and, by the way, this is shown by their own trade papers—that these packing people buy eggs, on an average, for illustration, at from 6¾ to 10 cents a dozen. They sell them, on an average, for 26 cents a dozen. Those are the figures, not just taken from a year or two, but the middle man makes over 200 per cent and in some cases over 300 per cent. In a former speech here I could not help paying my respects to a coarse fellow out in the West who bragged that he had made a fortune of nearly a half a million dollars within three weeks last year by cornering the egg market in the city of Chicago for that length of time. Are you going to permit it? We have got the power to change it. Well, they say this may not be the most effective means to get at it. It can not hurt anybody, can it? If the packers and warehousemen are doing right, can it hurt them to submit themselves to a governmental investigation? If they are doing right, why do they not come up and show us? I say to you, gentlemen, that the fact is they are getting profits that they know they are not entitled to. They are reaping where they have not sown, and to the detriment of the great consuming classes in this country; and both the producer and the consumer will never have relief until we take this splendid discovery, which means so much for our comfort and our happiness, so much for the improvement of our food, and regulate the system and make it perform the duties that it was intended to perform; take it out of the hands of the speculators and the gamblers in food products and put it in the hands of the Government, which will force them to do the right thing, and at the same time give them their reasonable profits.

I want to say something about State regulations. I will be very frank. I do not want to criticize any State organization; but if you will read the hearings that have taken place in Massachusetts you will find that some gentlemen would come in with a cold-storage bill along the lines of this one. The packing houses and the independent warehousemen would get together, and when the bill came out of the committee it would be built along lines to which they did not object, and they would say, "That is reasonable; that is nothing that will hurt us." They have such a law over here in Pennsylvania, and the packers are very much pleased with it, because it does not hurt them.

Now, what we want to do is to pass a law not that will hurt anybody but that will make them all do right; that is all. We have the power, because nearly nine-tenths of these products sooner or later are the subject of interstate commerce. It is a matter peculiarly within the Federal jurisdiction, and we will never get relief until the Congress passes a bill along the lines of this one. I do not mean to say that my bill is a perfect one or that it is going to cure every ill; but I think that when it is pared down and arranged and perfected by the committee and then goes through this House and is passed in the interest of the people, the producing and consuming public, and not in the interest of those who are using it for their own selfish purposes and designs, it is going to do more to bring about a settlement of the question of the high cost of living than any bill that has been enacted into law by this Congress in many years. [Applause.]

Now, gentlemen, I fear I have already taken too much of your time. I have made quite a study of this subject, and if there is any gentleman here, in the few moments that remain to me, who desires to ask me questions, I will be glad to answer if I can.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. FOWLER. The subject that the gentleman is discussing is the high cost of living, and I discover from his remarks a very large difference between the price paid to the producer and the price paid by the consumer. I would be glad to have the gentleman tell what he really thinks is the cause of this great difference to-day.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not quite catch what the gentleman asked.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman says that eggs, for instance, are bought up by the cold-storage people for from 6¾ to 10 cents per dozen and sold, on the average, at 26 cents a dozen. What causes the great difference between the price to the producer and the price paid by the consumer?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad that the gentleman asked that question, because it permits me to impress on the House a very important matter and one provided for in the bill. This applies not only to eggs, but to all other products stored in cold storage. This country is divided by the monopolistic packers and warehousemen into districts, and a certain monopoly in the city of Chicago can buy eggs in the States of Indiana or Ohio, and another one in Tennessee and Virginia, another one in another State, and another in Kansas, where so many eggs are produced. The producing districts in this country are divided up, and the agents of these packers are sent to these districts and they fix the price. They do not compete with each other when buying the product. The territory is divided. They do not compete with each other in selling the product, and that is the true reason of the large difference in the price paid to the producer and the price charged to the consumer. Does that answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. FOWLER. And by virtue of the cold storage and warehouses they are able to hold the product until they see fit to put it on the market.

Mr. McKELLAR. They are enabled to hold the product indefinitely at no substantial cost.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will.

Mr. SIMS. Has not the parcel post to some extent enabled the farmer to sell eggs at a better price by selling directly to the consumer? In other words, he is not now compelled to rely on the cold-storage purchaser as much as he has been heretofore?

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope that is to some extent true; but I heard an officer connected with the House when I was discussing this last year—and it was on the subject of eggs to which the gentleman referred—he told me that there were farmers outside of Washington City that supplied certain hotels with eggs in Washington. He said they were supplied as fresh country eggs. They sent them in every morning, but they bought them down

They sent them in every morning, but they bought them down here at the cold-storage plants every night, took them out, and shipped them in the next morning as fresh country eggs. The cold-storage people paid 6 to 10 cents a dozen for them and sold them to the farmers for about 25 or 30 cents a dozen, and the farmer brought them in as fresh eggs and sold them to the public the next morning at 50 cents a dozen. Of course the parcel post has to some extent done away with that.

Mr. SIMS. The parcel post has relieved to some extent the opportunity that the cold-storage people had to corner eggs, because the farmer can sell directly to the consumer. I will state what I know to be a fact, that during the winter and spring I bought every egg I used from a place distant 60 or 100 miles in Virginia. They came from the farmer, who sold them to me and sent them by parcel post, better known as the "Burleson Express," and I think it is giving a great relief along that line.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope so, and I hope that as we put it further into operation it will be greater.

Mr. SIMS. At the present time the Post Office Department issues a sort of advertising sheet in which farmers all over the country may advertise what they have that can be shipped by parcel post, and you can buy half a dozen or a dozen eggs, and it does not require any middleman at all. That does not remove the purposes of the gentleman's bill, but it helps the matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I think it helps. Somebody told me a few days ago, in discussing this matter, that cold storage was intended to provide that the products of a season of overproduction should be carried over to a season of scarcity, and that is true and very properly so. If it was used right it would be of great benefit to the public. I think my good friend from Missouri said, "Why, do you know if we did not have cold storage we would have to pay three or four times as much for eggs in the fall of the year, in times of scarcity, as we do now?"

The trouble with my friend's proposition is that we have the statistics of the prices of eggs from 1880 to 1890, and from 1890 to 1900, which we get from the Agricultural Department, and the average price was not much more than half what they were last fall, and they did not have cold storage for eggs in those years. Cold storage is largely a modern improvement. So far as beef and other products are concerned, it was used in the nineties for the first time, but it was not used for eggs until within the last 15 years.

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will.

Mr. PAIGE of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think the high cost of products outside of cold storage is caused in getting the products from the producer to the consumer?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that is true. I think the middleman's profits are in a great many instances too large. That is one of the things my friend from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] seems to think the parcel post is destined to correct to some extent.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I understand my friend to take this position, that the cold-storage proposition is one of great benefit to the people of this country.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, the greatest possible; it can hardly be estimated.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman please tell the House how it can be of great benefit to the country on the question of eggs, if eggs are much higher ever since we have had cold storage? Why not abolish the cold storage, so far as eggs are concerned, and make them cheaper?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the price of eggs is due to the abuses of cold storage, but not to the cold storage itself, and if the gentleman had investigated it along the same lines that these other gentlemen have investigated it from time to time and have testified to it he would be of the same opinion.

Mr. BOOHER. I understand the gentleman to argue that the cold-storage people are the middlemen.

Mr. McKELLAR. They are the middlemen; yes.

Mr. BOOHER. I would like the gentleman to explain how he can conclude that. The farmer, we will say, for instance, is the producer of eggs and meat.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. He can not put them into cold storage, because he has not the facilities. The packer has the cold-storage plant.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. How does the packer become the middleman? I am anxious to find out who the middleman is whom we are all abusing so much.

Mr. McKELLAR. I may be technically incorrect in calling the packer the middleman, but the packer who buys from the producer and holds the product in cold storage indefinitely or definitely, as suits his purpose best, in order to get the highest price for it, is the middleman. He is not the producer or the consumer, but he is the man through whose hands the product has to pass before it gets to the consumer, and that is my understanding of the middleman.

Mr. BOOHER. The consumer does not buy directly from the packer. He buys from the retail man.

Mr. McKELLAR. It used to be that way. As a matter of fact, under present conditions he buys directly from the packer, and for this reason: There is not a butcher in any city in the country who sells packing-house products who does not sell at a price for those products fixed, not by the butcher himself but by the agents of the packing-house companies. That is why I say the consumer buys not from the retail grocery merchant, but from the packer, because he buys from the man who fixes the price.

Mr. BOOHER. Let us follow that out. We will say that the man who has a meat market in a small town buys his dressed meat from the packer.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is right.

Mr. BOOHER. He puts it on his block and sells it to his customers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. BOOHER. Which one of those people who have handled this meat is the middleman?

Mr. McKELLAR. Both.

Mr. BOOHER. The gentleman is in favor of wiping both of them out?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all. What I believe in is regulating the packer who is using the cold storage to the detriment of the whole people, and letting the law of supply and demand affect the retail merchant. My sister, who keeps house for me, stated to me on a particular week that beef had gone up 2 cents a pound, and she asked me if I would not ask the market man about it. I did; and he replied to me, "Mr. McKELLAR, I have nothing to do with it. The agent of the packing house directs what price I shall ask for the meat, and I can not handle his wares unless I demand of the public the price that he fixes." And you can ask any butcher in any city in this country, and he will tell you exactly the same thing if he tells you the truth.

Mr. BOOHER. In the town in which I live we have two meat markets, each one of which slaughters its own meats.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is an entirely different proposition. This bill is not aimed at that.

Mr. BOOHER. If they sell their meat at exactly the same price that butchers in other towns sell meat, the price of which is fixed by the packer, who, then, fixes the price that the butcher in my town sells at?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, it is fixed by the packer.

Mr. BOOHER. Where a man butchers his own stock?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course it is fixed by the packer. It is as plain as the nose on a man's face. The packer in a neighboring town, or perhaps in the gentleman's own town, fixes the price, and this man who slaughters his own meat is going to demand the same price for his meat, of course. Why should he not have the advantage of the higher price?

Mr. BOOHER. When you get down to the question of what these things are sold for, is it not really the ability of the man who buys to pay and the cupidity of the man who sells it?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is another way of expressing the law of supply and demand; but if it has not an effect on the price demanded by the packer, then I want to ask the gentleman a question. Would he defend a proposition whereby the packers of this country farm out the territory in which they buy their products, and then have their agents scattered all throughout the country to fix the price at which the consuming public shall take the product? Does the gentleman defend that system?

Mr. BOOHER. No; and if that is the case, there ought to be a law making it a crime to practice it, and the guilty party should be punished.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the gentleman heartily, and I want to say this: That if that is not the case, will the gentleman oppose a bill the effect of which is to investigate that very proposition?

Mr. BOOHER. I have not said that I was opposed to the gentleman's bill. I have been trying to find out who the gentleman is going to have for the middleman, and when the gentleman said he was a packer I thought we had got him, but I never could think that the packer was the middleman. I do not agree with the gentleman upon that.

Mr. McKELLAR. If you pass this bill for governmental inspection of foods that go into cold storage and governmental regulation of foods while they are in cold storage, you are going to put your finger on the place where the hurt comes.

Mr. BOOHER. I want to say to the gentleman that I will go as far toward the regulation of cold storage, probably, as any Member of the House, because I think it ought to be regulated.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the gentleman, and I appreciate his help.

Mr. BOOHER. But I would like to locate the middleman, if we can find him.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is what is proposed to be done under the terms of this bill.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will.

Mr. GOOD. Does the gentleman's bill fix a time limit within which the foodstuffs may be retained in cold storage?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not all foodstuffs. As I said, I think, before the gentleman came in, there are between 200 and 300 foodstuffs that go into cold storage. Now, this regulates only the leading foodstuffs, and fixes the time, of course.

Mr. GOOD. The reason I am inquiring is this: I received a number of letters some time ago from some apple growers, complaining in regard to the provisions of some bill—I am not sure it is the gentleman's bill—claiming that if it were passed it would allow a good deal of this fruit to go to waste, because the stuff would be taken out of cold storage before it could be used.

Mr. McKELLAR. This bill does not refer to fruits, for the reason that my idea was that we had better fight for some single line altogether, so that if this Congress would pass a law regulating cold storage of the necessities of life it is not going to pass a law regulating those things that are not necessities of life; so that the purpose of the bill is to regulate, first, at any rate, the necessities of life, and fruit is not considered a necessity of life in this bill.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. As I understand, the bill only applies to those articles that are placed in cold storage.

Mr. McKELLAR. It only applies to articles placed in cold storage, and I will give the gentleman what they are if he would like to hear them: Beef, and the period for which it is to be held is seven months; veal, and products thereof, two months; pork, four months; sheep or goats, four months; lambs or kids, three months; poultry, game, three months; fish, two months; and eggs, a variable arrangement required by necessity of the case, from three to seven months. Those are the principal foodstuffs, as the gentleman can see for himself. Now, I do not think the American public ought to be required—and, by the way, Dr. Pennington, a lady who is one of the best posted chemists on cold-storage matters in this country (she is connected with the Department of Agriculture), says that most of the poultry which is used in this country is from 1 to 2 years old. Did you ever see the little dark pieces in the poultry that you eat that you buy at an ordinary hotel and for which you pay 75 cents for half a chicken? If you look at it you may find a dark place on it. That chicken probably was put in cold storage, and improperly put in cold storage, about two years ago. The average time, so far as we can tell, because, mind you, there is a dearth of information about it, but, so far as we can tell, poultry is kept in cold storage about 15 to 18 months before it is consumed in this country and manifestly—and, by the way, I want to say this to you, gentlemen, that the poultry we eat that is put in cold storage is undrawn. Of course, gentlemen understand what that means. The chicken is put in there with his feathers on just like the chicken was when his neck was cut off, and very frequently the blood is still in its veins, and we eat that kind of chicken when we go to a first-class hotel and pay 75 cents for a half a chicken that was killed about two years ago.

Now, gentlemen may say that is all right. I believe that some men say that cold storage helps that condition. The next time you eat a piece of chicken—because I want to bring this home to you if I can; I want to pass this bill, because I believe it will do more for the relief of the American public and the consumers of this country than any other bill that can be passed—you look at the chicken you eat, and if you have good nostrils smell it a little, and you will find evidence of its just being dropped in by the hogshead. They have these big hogsheads about that high, and they drop them in, the undrawn chickens, feathers and all, and they leave the heads on them——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McKELLAR. I really feel I am imposing upon the committee, but let me finish this point and I will yield to both of my friends over here who have indicated that they have questions. They leave the heads on the chickens for a purpose. They are taken out of cold storage, the feathers are taken off, or, rather the chickens are drawn and the feathers are taken off—I do not know which first, but I presume it is feathers first—and then they are not allowed to thaw in the air, as they ought to be, which would make them very much better, according to Dr. Pennington and Dr. Wiley, but they thaw them in warm water. I do not know whether you gentlemen are going to eat any more chickens or not after hearing this story. When they thaw them they thaw them in warm water, so that it will fill the skin out and make them look like freshly killed chickens, but for fear they will not have that appearance they leave the heads on them. For that reason they are not bled properly, and in order to bleed a chicken properly the head ought to be cut off properly. They leave the heads on them in order to give them the appearance of a freshly killed chicken, and the housewife—your wife—goes to the market in the morning and she asks for a fresh chicken and finds this kind of a cold-storage chicken, one with the head on, and they say that is a fresh chicken when it may have been in cold storage from two and a half to three years, and I understand they can keep them in cold storage sometimes for four years.

Now, I want to yield to my friends over here. I beg your pardon for not having yielded before.

Mr. GOOD. Obviously there should be some Government regulation to prevent food of this kind being kept in cold storage beyond the period when it is suitable for food. What I want to ask the gentleman is this: I understand that on bacon, ham, salted meats, lard, and things of that kind that are not kept in cold storage, the price has been going up more rapidly, or as rapidly, as the price of fresh meat, and I wondered, if cold storage is accountable for the rise in the price of fresh meats, then how will you regulate the price in regard to cured meats?

Mr. McKELLAR. If anybody has told the gentleman that hams and lard, and every other article that he has mentioned, do not go into cold storage, they have misinformed him. They all go into cold storage.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is mistaken. I have cured hams myself.

Mr. McKELLAR. Personally, yes; and you have killed chickens, too, and they did not go into cold storage. But the gentleman is not a packer.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman knows that there is hardly a farmer in this country but that kills his hogs in the fall, salts down his pork, and in the spring he will smoke the ham in such a way that it is cured so that it will keep as the best kind of food for a number of months without going into cold storage.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the gentleman that I have been a farmer myself, and have killed hogs and cured hams, and likewise killed chickens by wringing their necks and letting them bleed, and I know all about it. But we are not talking of that kind of products. What we are talking about, and what this bill is made to regulate, is the 99½ per cent of hams and sausages and beef and fresh meat of every kind, and fish, eggs, and poultry, that come in from the farm, but through the packing houses.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether the primary purpose of his bill is to protect the public as to obtaining pure foods, or is it to control the price of the product?

Mr. McKELLAR. Both, of course, but in a modified sense as to price fixing. It is absolutely its purpose to bring about purity of foodstuffs and it will be one of the best pure-food laws that was ever passed in this country, I believe, and the only one that will be effective. And I will say to him about the price, that it does not control the price, but it will have a mighty effect upon reducing the price that is now asked by these monopolies.

Mr. SLOAN. Then your professed purpose is the matter of health?

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, it affects the public in two ways: First, in the matter of health. I say health, but some people eat rotten meats and are healthy, but it is certainly not a tasty thing to do. And this will be for their comfort and health.

Mr. SLOAN. Now, then, following that, you heard the discussion of Dr. Pennington before the Agricultural Committee?

Mr. McKELLAR. I not only heard it, but I talked with her and know what she thinks, and I believe that she is one of the most accomplished experts in this country.

Mr. SLOAN. Let me ask this: Is it not true that in the discussion of those matters she stated in substance that if these products, beef, poultry, and eggs, were properly prepared and properly placed in cold storage, the average period in which they would be good and pure would be at least twice the period that you have here in your schedule?

Mr. McKELLAR. No. I do not think she fixed any period. She held that eggs could be kept for a period of six months. Dr. Harvey Wiley says that if they are properly stored eggs can be kept three months, and if the farmer comes in and buys them from the cold storage within the period of three months and takes them out and sends them back as fresh eggs, nobody can tell the difference. But after three months the difference can be told.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I would like to ask my friend if the pure-food laws of the District of Columbia will permit a dealer to keep for sale poultry that has been in cold storage 18 months, with head and feathers on, and in an undrawn condition?

Mr. McKELLAR. The gentleman has asked me a question that I can not answer with certainty, but I do not think the pure-food law applies to that particular phase here. I would be glad to have the gentleman enlighten us.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I have not investigated this subject to the same degree that the gentleman has, but it is my impression that food supplies of the cities in the country are examined and supervised by inspectors, and nothing is offered for sale that does not come up to a certain standard.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say that in theory the gentleman may be correct about the local inspection, but if he will go around with a local inspector and examine the local places he will find the point is not carefully guarded.

Mr. BOOHER. Will the gentleman state again the maximum length of time eggs can be kept according to his bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. To meet a particular season and a particular difficulty, the wording of my bill is this, which I think will meet the approval of the gentleman from Missouri:

> Eggs held in cold storage not less than three months or more than seven months may not be classed as adulterated if they are, upon inspection, at the end of the three-months period sound and wholesome and are stamped or labeled as follows: "Second period cold-storage eggs," such stamp or label to be on each container from which said eggs are sold, and shall be in plain view of the purchaser, or, on demand, produced for inspection by the purchaser.

I will say to the gentleman in explanation of that, that eggs are different from beef. We have a period of superabundance and a period of scarcity. The period of great abundance is in the months of April, May, and June, as the gentleman knows. In February, March, July, August, September, and part of October the consumption about offsets the production, but in the months of April, May, and June the production largely exceeds the consumption. Now, the purpose of the bill is to allow these eggs to be carried over from the period of excess to the period of scarcity—in November, December, and part of January.

But, in doing it, it is the purpose of the bill to let the consuming public in the period of scarcity know exactly what they are buying, and not permit the dealer or middleman to palm off cold-storage products for fresh products.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I want the gentleman to have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Tennessee may have two minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOOHER. I want to ask just a short question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BOOHER. The experts all agree, I believe, that an egg can be kept with perfect safety for three months?

Mr. McKELLAR. Dr. Wiley says so, and Dr. Pennington says so, and a number of other experts agree. I think they are right, provided the egg is perfect when put into cold storage.

Mr. BOOHER. Yes. Do you not think it wrong in your bill to take the chances of keeping the egg seven months?

Mr. McKELLAR. Well, these same experts now say that for many purposes eggs held the additional four months can be used.

Mr. BOOHER. Then I think the gentleman's bill should set out specifically the purpose for which that stale egg could be used.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is a proper article of food within that period; that is, if properly kept. But the bill provides, as the gentleman will notice from the reading of it, that the consumer shall know exactly what he is getting, and the seller is obliged to tell him.

Mr. BOOHER. He knows he is getting the second period of storage eggs, and he does not know whether it is a good egg or a bad egg until he buys it and breaks it.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is so.

Mr. BOOHER. Why let the consumer take the chances on it? I think it ought not to remain in cold storage longer than it is wholesome.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I thank you for your kind attention, and I want to ask the Members of the House to join me in pressing this bill. It is now before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and because of the administration antitrust bills I mentioned a while ago it has been delayed. I hope the Members of the House who are interested in this question—and we all ought to be interested in it—will aid me in pressing it before the committee and before the House, so that the American people can be benefited by the enactment of its provisions. I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman having the bill in charge whether we can not come to an understanding as to the disposal of time. It is a very oppressive day, and there are several gentlemen who are desirous of discussing this bill, but owing to the oppressive heat they have been obliged to leave the Chamber.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Wisconsin how much time has been spoken for. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has asked me for an hour, and my colleague on the committee, Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania, has asked for 15 minutes. How much does the gentleman from Wisconsin desire?

Mr. STAFFORD. I think I could readily conclude in half an hour or three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. BARNHART. I think it would be well to reserve 15 minutes for the committee. If the gentleman will agree to close debate in 2 hours when we meet next Wednesday, I would be willing. Can we do that?

Mr. STAFFORD. We can not do that in committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman present a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. BARNHART. Yes. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the general debate close at the end of two hours after we resume the consideration of the bill on next Wednesday.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that when this bill is taken up on next Calendar Wednesday general debate may be closed in two hours thereafter.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary question. Can we fix the time for debate in the Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE].

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago the House passed Senate bill 4628, being an act extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, which bill was signed by the President and became a law on the 13th instant. During the consideration of the measure in the House a very determined effort was made to amend the first section so as to require the payment of interest on the deferred payments, the claim being made that to not require payment of interest was unfair and unjust, because it favored a class, and that so long as farmers under reclamation projects were not required to pay interest it could not be justified withholding money of the Government for loaning to farmers generally in the country. I observed that those who insisted upon the amendment providing for the payment of interest and those who supported them came largely from the Eastern and Middle States, and for their benefit I want to bring to the attention of the House the fact that the States represented by these Members received from the Treasury of the United States nearly $30,000,000, and that same was paid to them during the years 1836, 1837, and 1838, and that no part of the amount has ever been repaid into the Treasury, and no interest has been paid thereon. I would suggest to these gentlemen that it might be desirable to introduce a measure requiring the States having a portion of the fund to return it to the Treasury, which would be especially desirable just at this time, when our revenues are depleted and when we are seeking to provide the necessary funds to maintain the Government. These gentlemen seem to overlook the distinction between the proceeds received from the sale of public lands and revenue derived from taxation and other sources upon which we depend for the money necessary to meet the general expenses of the Government. The theory of the reclamation act is that it is not only within the power of Congress, but is in the interest of the development of the country as a whole, to treat the moneys received from the sale of public lands as a trust fund and to expend the same in developing and reclaiming the arid lands of the West, thereby making available homes for the homeless and adding to the wealth and general welfare of the Nation. This was the theory upon which the beneficent homestead law was enacted many years ago.

I imagine if the gentlemen who so earnestly insisted upon interest being charged in connection with deferred payments in reclamation projects had been Members of Congress when the homested act was considered they would have taken the position that was taken by some Members at that time—that it was unconstitutional to dispose of the public domain by giving it away; that if it was not unconstitutional it was unequal and unjust, because it was confined to one class of our people; or that it would injure the East by encouraging emigration to the West; and that, furthermore, to give away the land would deprive the old States of their just proportion of the proceeds that might be derived if the lands were to be sold for what might be gotten for them. They would not appreciate that there was any advantage to the Eastern States by the development of the West, because they seem to assume that the benefits of the reclamation law are limited to the immediate localities where the projects are located. Where would the city of Chicago be to-day if it had not been for the homestead act? Our very distinguished friends upon this floor from that great city, who advocated the interest proposition in connection with the reclamation act, do not seem to realize that their city has been built up by the development of the West, and its prosperity and future growth depends upon the further development and prosperity of that great region.

In 1860 Congress passed the first bill proposing to provide homesteads on the public domain, and on June 22 of that year President Buchanan vetoed the measure; and for the benefit of our reactionary friends who are unable to see any benefit to the whole country from the reclamation act, and to show to the House that they represent to some extent the position taken by President Buchanan when he vetoed the homestead bill, I want to quote from his message the following:

> It would require clear and strong evidence to induce the belief that the framers of the Constitution, after having limited the powers of Congress to certain precise and specific objects, intended by employing the words "dispose of" to give that body unlimited power over the vast public domain. It would be a strange anomaly indeed to have created two funds—the one by taxation, confined to the execution of the enumerated powers delegated to Congress, and the other from the public lands, applicable to all subjects, foreign and domestic, which Congress might designate; that this fund should be "disposed of," not to pay the debts of the United States, nor "to raise and support armies," nor "to provide and maintain a navy," nor to accomplish any one of the other great objects enumerated in the Constitution, but be diverted from them to pay the debts of the States, to educate their people, and to carry into effect any other measure of their domestic policy. This would be to confer upon Congress a vast and irresponsible authority utterly at war with the well-known jealousy of Federal power which prevailed at the formation of the Constitution. The natural intendment would be that as the Constitution confined Congress to well-defined specific powers, the funds placed at their command, whether in land or money, should be appropriated to the performance of the duties corresponding with these powers. If not, a Government has been created with all its other powers carefully limited, but without any limitation in respect to the public lands.
> * * * That it never was intended by the framers of the Constitution that these lands should be given away by Congress is manifest from the concluding portion of the same clause. By it Congress has power not only "to dispose of" the territory, but of the "other property of the United States."

In addition to his constitutional objections to the measure, among other reasons for his veto, he said:

> It will prove unequal and unjust in its operation, because from its nature it is confined to one class of our people.

He further said, commenting upon the giving away of the public lands, and I want to particularly bring this to the attention of those who are opposed to the reclamation act or to other measures that encourage the development of the West and the settlement of the unused and unoccupied public lands, because this expression represents apparently the sentiment of these gentlemen:

> But to give this common inheritance away would deprive the old States of their just proportion of this revenue without holding out the least corresponding advantage. Whilst it is our common glory that the new States have become so prosperous and populous, there is no good reason why the old States should offer premiums to their own citizens to emigrate from them to the West. That land of promise presents in itself sufficient allurements to our young and enterprising citizens without any adventitious aid. The offer of free farms would probably have a powerful effect in encouraging emigration, especially from States like Illinois, Tennessee, and Kentucky, to the west of the Mississippi, and could not fail to reduce the price of property within their limits.

I will not spend any time discussing the wisdom of the original reclamation act and the benefits that have resulted and will continue to result therefrom. The subject was very fully discussed during the consideration of the Senate bill extending the period of payments. I think it has been established that the original legislation was wise and its enactment has been beneficial. Possibly some of the details of the act might have been put in a form that would have better safeguarded the expenditure of the fund, but that is something that can easily be corrected. It is no argument, because some of the provisions of the act may be criticized, that the act itself should be condemned.

The matter of granting long time to the settlers who may undertake to acquire title to lands in reclamation projects is in no sense class legislation, it being merely to encourage the settlement and development of lands that otherwise might never be productive, and any person anywhere in the whole United States may avail himself, if he desires, of the advantages or benefits of the law, and therefore it can not be successfully asserted that it is legislation confined to a certain class and beneficial only to a locality.

The more producers there are in the West the better it is for the consumer of the East, first, because it will cheapen the cost of living and also provide additional markets for the manufactured products of the East.

It has always been the policy of our Government to encourage development, and millions of acres of valuable public lands were given as subsidies to railroads. Perhaps it would have been better if there had been more conservatism in this regard, but everyone recognizes that had it not been for this policy the present development of the West would not have obtained in this and possibly not in the next generation. We have in this Congress provided an appropriation for the construction of a railroad in far-off Alaska. The gentlemen who were opposed to the reclamation-extension act because it did not provide for the payment of interest on deferred payments, on the theory that it was class legislation, favored the appropriation for the Alaskan railroad, and yet it would seem that that is an expenditure of public funds more distinctively class in its character than the reclamation act.

I am in favor of any legislation or appropriation of public funds, within reasonable bounds, that will promote and encourage development and industry throughout the Nation, and I will go to the extreme in making it possible to further aid the people to make it easier for them to live and prosper, and I am not so narrow that I oppose measures simply because I may not see any direct benefit to my immediate constituency.

I do not wish to discredit Members of the House because of their opposition to any legislation, and I do not wish to be understood as questioning the good faith or the patriotism of those who opposed the passage of the reclamation-extension act by insisting that there should be no extension without the payment of interest, because I think they acted conscientiously, and because they believed that in justice to all the people they ought to take that position.

In order that there may be no doubt about the statement that I have made with relation to the money held by the several States that was distributed from the Treasury many years ago, I wish to have read the following letter, with the list of States to which the fund was distributed, showing the amount each State received.

The letter and list is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
Washington, July 29, 1914.

Hon. CHARLES H. BURKE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: By direction of the Secretary and in reply to your communication of the 23d instant, relative to the distribution of the Treasury surplus to the several States under the act of 1836, I have to inform you that it is understood that your inquiry relates to the deposits by the Federal Government with the States which were directed to be made by the thirteenth section of the act approved June 23, 1836 (5 U. S. Stat., 55), entitled "An act to regulate the deposits of the public money," and provided "that the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st day of January, 1837, reserving the sum of $5,000,000, shall be deposited with such of the several States in proportion to their respective representation in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, as shall, by law, authorize their treasurers or other competent authorities to receive the same on the terms hereinafter specified." The terms were that the States receiving deposits should, through their treasurers or other competent authorities, sign certificates of deposits therefor in such form as might be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, which would express the usual and legal obligations and pledge the faith of the State for the safe-keeping and repayment thereof, and should "pledge the faith of the States receiving the same to pay the said moneys and every part thereof from time to time whenever the same shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of defraying any wants of the Public Treasury beyond the amount of the five millions aforesaid."

Under this legislation three installments were placed with the several States. Before the time for the making of the deposit of the fourth installment the condition of the Treasury was such that the Secretary withheld the fourth installment. Upon the meeting of Congress in September, 1837, the subject received immediate consideration, and on October 2, 1837, there was passed and approved "An act to postpone the fourth installment of deposits with the States." (5 U. S. Stat., p. 201.) This act contained the following proviso:

"Provided, That the three first installments under the said act shall remain on deposit with the States until otherwise directed by Congress."

Congress has never directed the return of the deposits, and the matter stands at this date as it was left by the act of October 2, 1837, no part of the moneys deposited with any of the States ever having been returned to the Treasury.

As authorized by the act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 776), the accounting officers credited the general account of the Treasurer of the United States and charged the several States with the sums deposited under the act of June 23, 1836, as directed by the provision of the act of June 25, 1910, as follows:

"Provided, That the credit herein authorized to be given to the Treasurer of the United States shall in no wise affect or discharge the indebtedness of the several States to the United States as is provided in said act of Congress approved June 23, 1836, and shall be made in such manner as to debit the respective States chargeable therewith upon the books of the Treasury Department until otherwise directed by Congress."

A list of the States which received deposits and the amount received by each of the total deposits of $28,101,644.91 is inclosed herewith.

Respectfully,

WM. P. MALBURN, Assistant Secretary.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time to allow the gentleman from Indiana to move that the committee rise.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAGE of North Carolina, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15902) to amend, revise, and codify the laws relating to the public printing and binding and the distribution of Government publications and had come to no resolution thereon.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the ship-registry bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the shipping bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the immigration law.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BUCHANAN] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of immigration. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11451, and agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. When did that bill come over?

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. It came over yesterday.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I suggest to the gentleman that he can bring up his proposition in the morning.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can call it up in the morning.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, August 20, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

SENATE.

THURSDAY, August 20, 1914.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, August 19, 1914.)

The Senate reassembled at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SECRETARY. In section 7, page 7, line 16, after the word "from," insert the word "lawfully," so as to read:

That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I dislike very much to call for a quorum this morning, but I am quite sure the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] having the bill in charge would not like to have the question passed on now, because it would come up again. For that reason, and that only, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Nelson	Smoot
Bankhead	Gallinger	Norris	Stone
Brady	Gronna	Overman	Swanson

Mr. JONES. The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

I wish also to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. JAMES and Mr. SHIELDS answered to their names when called.

Mr. LEE of Maryland and Mr. STERLING entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have received hundreds of telegrams of the following tenor:

We earnestly protest against the passage of that section of the Clayton bill exempting labor and agricultural organizations from the provisions of the Sherman law. Such exemption we deem class legislation of the rankest kind. We therefore hope that you will use your best efforts to defeat the same.

I have also received hundreds of telegrams of this effect:

The tenth convention of District No. 10, United Mine Workers, assembled in Seattle, request the passage by the Senate of the Clayton House resolution exempting farmer and labor organizations from the operation of the Sherman antitrust law.

Those who send these telegrams believe that section 7 of this proposed law exempts farmers' and laborers' organizations from prosecutions under the Sherman law for acts done in undue restraint of interstate commerce. Both are mistaken. It does nothing of the kind, and when the section is clearly understood there will be no objection to it anywhere in the country, in my judgment, unless the members of the organizations referred to should object to it on the ground that it does not go far enough. Those who so violently oppose it will see that it does not at all do what they think it does. Those who favor it may find that it does not go nearly so far as they believe or desire.

It is unfortunate that in the discussion of cases arising under the Sherman Antitrust Act many misstatements have been made, and the effect of decisions has been misrepresented, either intentionally or ignorantly and carelessly. This has given rise to much misapprehension as to the effect of and operation of this law regarding labor and farmer organizations. Many misstatements have been so often repeated as to be accepted as facts. Prosecutions for acts done outside of the objects and purposes of such organizations and in a manner contrary to the legitimate purposes thereof have led to charges and statements that prosecutions have been made against these organizations as such, and that their legitimate objects have been interfered with. This has been done so persistently that the members of these organizations have come to believe that their organizations, as such, have come under the ban of the Sherman law, and that the courts have without warrant held them to be contrary to that law. This has led others very naturally to conclude that legislation urged by such organizations and proposed in their behalf is intended to give to such organizations and their members some special privileges, and to permit them to do and commit acts contrary to that law, and they have very naturally concluded that this proposed law does this. They have concluded that this legislation will make legal certain acts done by these organizations which if done by other organizations or persons would be illegal.

The courts have not held these organizations illegal; they have not held that the mere fact of the existence of such organizations showed that the Sherman law had been violated. Some isolated cases in inferior courts may have gone this far, but no authoritative court has done so. On the contrary, the courts of last resort have uniformly held that such organizations are not in themselves illegal, but are entirely lawful. In my judgment the criticism that has been leveled at the courts for holding such organizations to come within the terms of the Sherman law when acts have been committed in undue restraint of interstate commerce has been most unjust. The blame, if any, lies with Congress. While some men of great ability and high character and lofty patriotism did declare in the debates that such organizations should be exempt from the provisions of that law, and while a provision to that effect was in some of the measures introduced or proposed, there were other men of equally high character and ability who contended that such organizations should not be exempt, and the legislation that Congress actually passed did not contain any provision exempting such organizations from its operation, but Congress did declare that—

Every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations, is hereby declared to be illegal.

There is no exception made or hinted at in the Sherman law; no organizations are declared to be exempt. No suggestion is made that any organization or any person is exempt from the operation of that law.

All through the act its terms are all-embracing. There is nothing to show that it was the intention of Congress to exempt any body or any person from the prohibition against restraint of trade. The court had to construe the law as it passed and not as some said in debate it ought to be and not as we may think it should have passed. Instead of the court legislating when it declared labor organizations to be included within the prohibitions of the law against restraint of trade, it simply declared the law as Congress had enacted it; and if the law did not declare what Congress intended, the fault was that of Congress and not of the courts. The courts get much blame that should, in fact, attach to Congress. We pass laws almost every day of doubtful meaning and uncertain intention.

When we have a purpose to accomplish which is difficult to express we use broad, general, uncertain, and comprehensive terms, and leave it to the courts to construe and apply them. We ought not to do this; we ought not place such a burden on the courts. When these laws are construed, as they must be, those who are not suited by the construction given are dissatisfied and charge the courts with interfering with legislative functions, when, in fact, we are to blame for not making our meaning and intention clear.

Mr. President, there is a division of opinion as to the meaning of section 7 of this act and of some of the terms employed. Some Members of Congress contend that it means one thing and others contend that it means another. Why is it not possible for Congress to say what it means and express in clear and unequivocal language what its intention is, so that the courts will not have to bear the burden and the onus and the blame for a construction of the law which may not coincide with the views and opinions of some of us in passing it? If there is an uncertainty about the meaning or the construction that ought to be given to the language of the section, it is the duty of Congress to make it clear and plain, for it can be made clear and plain.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington permit an interruption?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington a question. In section 7 there is language found which, I think, is uncertain in its meaning. For example, section 7 provides that nothing in the antitrust laws, as I remember the language, shall prevent the existence and operation of labor organizations and farmers' organizations, and so forth. Is not the word "operation" susceptible of different interpretations? Will not the question arise as to the lines along which a labor organization or a farmers' organization may operate, the methods which they may pursue, and so forth? Be as careful as we may, will there not be an uncertainty in the language, and will it not have to be eventually interpreted by the courts?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have just suggested that very situation. I do not think we have made the language as certain as we may. I think we may make the language more certain and definite and clear as to what is really intended by the section. I have just suggested that there is a decided difference of opinion among Members of Congress as to what the real meaning and effect of this section is. I think that we ought to try to make it clear in the interest of labor itself. I understand that labor is satisfied with this provision, and yet it may be that after years of litigation, after years of trial in the courts, the decision may finally be that Congress meant something entirely different from what they expected; and we may find at the end of three or four years that instead of accomplishing something we have done nothing. I think it would be better for these organizations if Congress would try to make its meaning and intention clear. If Congress intends to provide one thing, let us say so; let us do it; and if it intends to provide for something else, let us say that and make provision for it and thereby do our duty and also protect the courts from unjust criticism and aspersion.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington, further, if there is any question in his mind now that under the Sherman antitrust law as it is there is the right, as shown by the construction given by the courts to the language of the act, of labor organizations and farmers' organizations to exist and to operate? Can there be any question at all in regard to the right of existence and operation of such organizations under the law as it is, and need it be made any more definite and certain in view of the decisions of courts charged with the interpretation of the law?

Mr. JONES. I think I shall make my views about that clear before I get through.

Nor does this proposed section 7 make acts done by some organizations legal which if done by other organizations would be illegal. It does not permit these organizations to commit acts in undue restraint of trade which would be prohibited to other organizations. While some few might argue in favor of such an exemption, there is no considerable number of our citizens, laborers, farmers, or otherwise, who would urge that they be permitted to restrain trade and others be prohibited from doing it. One of the cardinal principles of farmers' and laborers' organizations is "special privileges to none and equal rights to all." A law that would allow some persons or organizations to commit certain acts and make it unlawful for other persons and organizations to do the same thing would be more injurious in the long run to the organizations and persons given this special privilege than beneficial, and nothing would sooner undermine the very foundations of our Government than such a course.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, would the Senator from Washington mind explaining right here if the farmers are not given the right to restrain trade by organizing to fix the price of their products, then what rights are the farmers given under this bill? What would a farmers' organization accomplish unless as an organization it may fix the farmers' own price for their products? And has not that always been declared to be in restraint of trade?

Mr. JONES. I am going a little further along to refer to farmers' organizations, but I will say right here that I think there can be farmers' organizations which do not have for their purpose or object the restraint of trade or an interference with commerce at all. We have some farmers' organizations in my own county which do not pretend to interfere with trade; the farmers simply gather together and talk over the situation, talk over their condition, and what will be beneficial to them, and so on; but I am going to touch on that point later.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, is there any new law needed to confirm that right?

Mr. JONES. I am going to touch on that question just a little later on. I propose to discuss those various subjects further on, and it will probably save time if I do not go into them now.

The Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]—and I regret he is not here, for I told him a moment ago that I expected to refer to his speech on some points—made a very interesting speech on the proposition involved in section 7 the other day. I want to take it as a text to show how unfounded is the popular view regarding the action of the courts and the operations of the Sherman law as affecting farmers' organizations, and it will apply also to labor organizations in greater or less degree. It was not only an interesting speech but a most remarkable one in many respects. It illustrates most strikingly and perfectly how and why wrong impressions may be fostered and how the people may honestly acquire wholly wrong ideas. The Senator has unwittingly given a strong basis for a wrong impression among the farmers as to the action of the courts and the effect of the Sherman law upon farmers' organizations. He is the victim of the very error into which he has fallen and into which his speech may be the means of misleading many of our people. That he is not to blame for this every Senator knows, because of the multitude of duties that press upon us here. No Senator can investigate the truth of every statement that comes to his knowledge, and he has a right to assume that statements commonly and frequently made and not denied are true.

With much of his speech I am in hearty accord. His eulogy of the farmer has my hearty approval. He has uttered it in so much more beautiful language than I could formulate that I adopt it as my own. I agree with him in his clear distinction between labor and capital or commerce. Labor is not a commodity. It is not an article of commerce. We can not ship it; we do not transport it. Laws governing the transportation of articles of trade and commerce are not applicable to labor at all, and there is no class distinction in enacting legislation that is applicable to the one and not to the other.

It is urged that farmers' organizations should be exempt from the operations of the Sherman law. I do not believe that there is much demand for this. None has been made to me, or, at least, very few such requests have come—so few that I do not now remember of having received any request from any organization in my State for this exemption. Neither the granges nor the farmers' unions nor any other farmers' organizations have asked me to work for their exemption. Probably they do not know that they are prohibited by that law now. They have not been disturbed. Their associations have not been attacked, and probably they think they do not need any exemption. It has been sought to create a demand on the part of farmers' organizations for such exemption because of the alleged prosecution of a farmers' organization in Kentucky, and through this case it is sought to make the farmers believe that they need relief of this kind. This case has been so persistently misrepresented that the statements in regard to it have been accepted as facts, and the distinguished Senator has been deceived, and his unwittingly mistaken statements regarding this case are apt to be used to deceive and mislead the people and create a prejudice against the courts and the Government. When the Senator, in his speech the other day, said:

> These eight men—

Referring to the defendants in the case of the United States against Steers, in the One hundred and ninety-second Federal Reports—> who resorted simply to the right of "free speech," were indicted and convicted of the crime of conspiring to restrain interstate trade and commerce.

I was amazed and shocked and when he read from the Farmers' Union News that the facts in the case are simply these:

> Two or three years ago these men, who are excellent citizens of Grant County, Ky., and who stand high in the good opinion of their neighbors, persuaded one of their neighbors to haul his white leaf tobacco back from the railroad station, where he had taken it, and had consigned it to a commission broker in Cincinnati, Ohio, just across the State line. For merely persuading a fellow friend and neighbor into withdrawing his products from the railroad's custody, which the shipper, the neighbor, had a perfect legal right to do, and where he had taken it and consigned it to a point in another State under the mistaken notion that the planters were no longer holding their tobacco, these eight men have been indicted and convicted of a crime.

And when the Senator himself stated that the statement of the defendant Steers did not differ substantially from the statement of the case by the court, and said that the—> defendants all claimed that there were no threats of any character made, and no force, coercion, or other unlawful means used or attempted by those who finally persuaded Osborne to hold on to his tobacco for a higher price—

I myself wondered, as he said—

> how these facts or circumstances could possibly amount to a violation of section 2 of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

I agree with the Senator that this, to use his own language, "is difficult to understand," until the actual facts of the case are understood.

As I have said, it seemed to me very strange and very remarkable that these men should be indicted for a mere persuasion of another man to withdraw his goods from shipment; it seemed very strange to me that they would be indicted for the mere exercise of free speech. So I secured the case and looked it up, and what did I find? I have the case here, and the facts are entirely different from those set out by the Senator and from those described in the newspaper article which he read. Here are the facts as set out by the court, and they must be taken as the facts in the case as found by the court and the jury, because it must not be forgotten that these men were tried by a jury who heard all the testimony, and while the Senator says that the defendants claim there was no coercion the report of the case shows that not one of the defendants went on the stand and testified in this case. Where they made any such statement as that to which the Senator refers or under what circumstances, I do not know; but they did not make it in the case. The only witness who went on the stand for the defendants was one witness who testified as to their good character. Now, this is what the court says—Mr. President, I will ask to put in the full statement of the court in the RECORD, and will not read it now; but this is the substance and the gist of the facts as set out by the court——

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for a moment?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to express the hope that the Senator will proceed to read that statement, because of its pertinency and because we are all interested in this question.

Mr. JONES. I am going to read the real gist of it, and I think that when I read it it will be all the Senator will care to have read. If after I read this he cares to have me read the whole statement, I will do so. In the statement the court said this:

> During Tuesday and Wednesday Osborne—

Osborne was the man who had consigned his tobacco—

During Tuesday and Wednesday Osborne received messages to the effect that he must not ship this tobacco, and on the evening of Thursday a considerabe number of men gathered in Dry Ridge with seeming reference to the matter of this shipment, and three of Osborne's acquaintances or neighbors went out to his farm to see him. They told him that there was a crowd of 50 men at Dry Ridge; that the crowd was determined this tobacco should not be shipped; and that, unless Osborne would withdraw the tobacco, it would be destroyed, and he or his property might be otherwise injured.

There is the case; there are the facts that were found in the case by the jury. Those are the facts upon which these men were convicted. This was a threat; this was not mere persuasion; it was coercion. This was not the simple exercise of the right of "free speech"; it was intimidation.

Is not this an entirely different case from what it was supposed to be by the Senator? Surely he will not contend that these men had the right to do these things. If this legislation passes, the Senator will not contend that it will legalize such acts as these. Not at all; such acts will still be unlawful, just as they are unlawful now.

I ask that I may incorporate in the RECORD without reading the full statement of the court to which I have referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

In November, 1907, W. T. Osborne, living upon a farm near Dry Ridge, Ky., and his two tenants, Stowers and Bryant, had in their possession about four hogsheads of tobacco, being their entire crop for the season 1906. They delivered these four hogsheads to Ramsey, the railroad station agent at Dry Ridge, and directed shipment to Cincinnati, Ohio. Ramsey gave to Osborne a bill of lading in customary form, showing that he was the shipper and that the "Globe House, Cincinnati, Ohio," was the consignee. This was Tuesday, November 26. It was too late for shipment that day, and the next day there was no car available, so that on Thursday the tobacco was remaining in the railroad warehouse awaiting transportation.

An existing association among the tobacco raisers of the vicinity, called the "Society of Equity," or the "Burley Society," had pooled and was holding at its warehouses all the tobacco of its members until such holding, with other causes, should bring about a higher price, and it was opposed to the shipment to market of any tobacco not so pooled. Osborne and his tenants did not belong to the association and their four hogsheads of tobacco were unpooled.

During Tuesday and Wednesday Osborne received messages to the effect that he must not ship this tobacco, and on the evening of Thursday a considerable number of men gathered in Dry Ridge with seeming reference to the matter of this shipment, and three of Osborne's acquaintances or neighbors went out to his farm to see him. They told him that there was a crowd of 50 men at Dry Ridge; that the crowd was determined this tobacco should not be shipped, and that unless Osborne would withdraw the tobacco it would be destroyed and he or his property might be otherwise injured. He then determined that it might be withdrawn, and to accomplish this result he indorsed over the bill of lading to one of his visitors. The next morning, in seeming pursuance of some previously formed plan, a large body of men, probably 200 or 300, said to be more than he had ever seen together there before, assembled in Dry Ridge and marched to the railroad station. The indorsed bill of lading was presented, the tobacco was turned over by the station agent, and the procession, headed by four teams carrying the four hogsheads, marched away from the station, after the crowd had called the agent outside and notified him that he must not ship any unpooled tobacco. The four hogsheads were then returned to Osborne's premises and kept there by him until January 14, 1908. On this last day one of those who had been active in the proceeding notified Osborne that he was at liberty to ship the tobacco, and he did so at once.

A special grand jury considered these acts to be in violation of the congressional act approved July 2, 1890, commonly called the "Sherman antitrust law," and returned an indictment against the appellants and four others. Motions to quash and demurrers were overruled, and the respondents tried upon their pleas of not guilty. The case was nolle prossed as to one respondent, the jury acquitted three, and the appellants, eight in number, were convicted and severally sentenced to pay considerable fines. They all join in this writ and assign a large number of errors. While we have not omitted to consider each one argued, we must confine this opinion to the few which seem to us most deserving of discussion.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to his colleague?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to ask the Senator if such an act as he has just described is not unlawful and punishable under laws other than the Sherman law?

Mr. JONES. I think so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. So that in such a class of cases as that, where violence and intimidation and violent coercion are resorted to, the Sherman law need not be involved at all?

Mr. JONES. Not necessarily.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Such acts can be prevented under other laws, and constitute a different set of cases, based upon a different principle, than those which are prohibited as being in restraint of trade.

Mr. JONES. That is true; but I am simply setting this out because this case has often been cited as a case of absolute injustice, as one that shows that the farmers need this exemption, and as one that warrants us in repealing legislation upon the statute books that may cover a situation like that; and the quotation which I have made from the speech of the Senator from Kansas shows that the Senator unwittingly accepted the loose statements which have been going about and which create a wrong impression among the people as to the action of the court in this case and other cases of a similar character. Now, does the Senator from South Dakota care to have the other part of the statement read?

Mr. STERLING. I think not. I will say to the Senator that I think that will be sufficient.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. Has the Senator read the record of that case as to the acts that had been committed previous to that time?

Mr. JONES. No; I have not.

Mr. KENYON. Such as the burning of property, the shooting of people, and the nonenforcement of the State law?

Mr. JONES. I have not. It seemed to me that it was not even necessary to go further than the statement of the court to show the error into which the Senator from Kansas had fallen.

Mr. KENYON. Those are what were commonly known as the "night-rider" cases.

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Mr. KENYON. The Government tried to break up the night-rider practices under the Sherman Act, and it did accomplish the purpose, which the State laws seemed unable to accomplish.

Mr. JONES. The Senator from Kansas says that it was a surprise when it was found that labor organizations were included in this law, but it was "a greater astonishment when farmers' organizations were also included"; and he says, "There seems, however, but one prosecution of organizations of this kind that ever reached the higher courts," referring to this Steers case. This case was not brought against the association; it was against the individuals who committed the unlawful acts of coercion and intimidation. No charge was made at any time that the organization was an unlawful organization, and this case is no basis whatever for any contention that such organizations are now unlawful. This organization was a perfectly lawful organization, as the Senator himself says in another part of his speech. It was never indicted or prosecuted. No action was taken because its members were holding their crops for higher prices; no action was taken because they had pooled their crops and refused to sell; no action was taken until an innocent farmer outside the organization was forced by threats and coercion to withdraw from commerce the products which he had already consigned. Mr. President, if this is the only case to show that this legislation is needed for the protection of the farmers of the country from unjust prosecution, then they need not worry whether this legislation is passed or not.

Section 7 of the bill before us reads as follows:

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations instituted for the purposes of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations or the members thereof be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

Those really interested in this provision are the labor organizations of the country. They want it; they believe they ought to have it; they believe they need it. This is not class legislation. It does not permit labor to restrain trade or commerce while prohibiting others from doing it. Capital can combine; it can and does organize now, and no one complains unless it does actually restrain trade, and often not then. A mere commercial combination may in itself be a restraint of trade, and therefore in violation of the law and its continuance a continued violation of the law. An association or organization of laborers can not in and of itself be a restraint of trade. It is not a combination or association of anything entering into trade and commerce. Trade and commerce are made up of articles or commodities; not of labor, but the products of labor. Combinations of capital control commodities or the instruments of commerce; combinations of labor are simply the association of human beings. Legislation for the regulation and control of the one may be no more suitable for the regulation and control of the other than would legislation for the control of a flying machine be suitable for the control of railroad trains.

In my judgment, this provision does not give to labor a single right that it does not now possess. This provision simply says, in effect, that the existence of labor organizations is not unlawful; that their operations for mutual help are legal; that the lawful efforts of their members to carry out their legitimate objects is not forbidden; and that such organizations are not per se in restraint of trade nor their members as such conspirators in restraint of trade. All this, in my judgment, is lawful now. I do not believe that any decision of any court can be found where it has been held that a labor organization, independent and apart from acts done by its members, is simply by virtue of its formation and existence a combination in violation of the Sherman law. No court of last resort has held that laborers, in the absence of contract, can not quit work either singly or in a body, and for any reason whatever or for no reason, and regardless of the consequences to private or public interests. The right to do so is an inherent right and its exercise is superior to the rights of the individual or the public, and the courts can not inquire into the consequences of the exercise of such right with a view to preventing it.

Any employer can discharge his employees at any time for any reason or without any reason and regardless of the consequences to them or the public, and the employees have the equal right to quit work for any reason or no reason at all and regardless of the consequences to their employers or the public. If the thousands of employees of a great railroad system of the country should advise the managers or owners of such system that they intend to quit work unless they are paid certain wages, they can quit if the wages are not paid, no matter what the effect on commerce may be. They have an inherent right to ask for an increase of wages. They have an inherent right to quit work if they are not satisfied with their wages or any other condition. The effect of their quitting work upon commerce, the railroad system, or the community, however disastrous, is purely incidental and is subordinate to that infinitely greater right which every free man has to act freely and as he sees fit, so long as he does not infringe upon the rights of some one else. If after quitting work the individual or the organization goes further and unlawfully interferes with the right of others to work or with the operation of the road, prosecution and punishment may follow, and it will follow just as surely and swiftly after the passage of this provision as before.

Labor has the right now to solicit and peaceably persuade others to join its organizations and its undertakings. All these things it can do now for mutual help, to raise wages, to maintain employment, and better its conditions. Isolated cases here and there may deny some of these rights or detached sentences may be found in decisions pointing to a different conclusion, but the whole trend of modern decisions and every authoritative case will sustain every one of these propositions. This provision gives no more than this. Why pass it? What is its purpose? It is to set at rest in an authoritative way by legislative enactment any doubt that may exist as to these rights of labor, or rather to set at rest this one question, to wit, whether a labor organization is per se a combination in violation of the Sherman law, and therefore liable to dissolution irrespective of what it or its members may do. Some able lawyers have held that it is so liable to dissolution, and labor thinks they may be right, and this provision sets at rest that doubt. Surely no one who understands this will object to such legislation, and those who have protested against this section will most surely approve its passage when they understand it. In other words, this provision is no more and no less than a legislative declaration of existing law as enunciated by the courts. Mr. WEBB, now chairman of the Judiciary Committee of the House and who had charge of the bill in that body, said regarding this provision:

> It is needless to say that we have had much diversity of opinion in adopting and agreeing on this particular section, but after all, Mr. Chairman, we have embodied in this amendment what we understand to be the best legal interpretation of the best judges in the United States. Personally I have never had any idea that the existence and operation of labor organizations, of farmers' unions, or fraternal orders were ever intended to come within the provisions of the antitrust law. However, some labor leaders have contended for many years that labor organizations have their existence as a matter of sufferance and at the whim of the Attorney General, and if suit should be brought, if they were not dissolved entirely, much trouble could be given them. We are therefore writing into the statutes of the United States the consensus of opinion of the best judges of the country on this troublesome question. I have not had an opportunity of reading the opinion, but only last Friday the circuit court of appeals of the fourth circuit at Richmond, Va., held that a labor organization was not a conspiracy or combination in restraint of trade. Therefore we say that we have embodied in this section as set forth in the first part of section 7 and as expressed in the latter part of this amendment which I now offer what is generally understood to be the law and should be the law in the United States with reference to labor organizations, as well as fraternal and farmers' organizations.

Then, on page 10374, he says this:

> We wanted to make it plain that no labor organization or farmers' organization organized for mutual help without profit should be construed to be a combination in restraint of trade or a conspiracy under the antitrust laws. Now, I will say frankly to my friend that we never intended to make any organizations, regardless of what they might do, exempt in every respect from the law. I would not vote for any amendment that does do that.
> Mr. MURDOCK. If the labor organization goes beyond the province of mutual help, then is it subject to the Sherman antitrust laws?
> Mr. WEBB. If it violates the law, it is. Of course it is an organization subject to the law, and I ask if my friend from Kansas would vote to exempt it from all laws?

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator from Washington right there in order to ask a question.

Take the farmers, for instance, and say they have organized a farmers' union, and they want to boost the price of cotton. They want to connect themselves up and give cotton receipts for the money; and as cotton is always ready money at some price, they might take half price. Assuming that cotton usually sold at 12 cents, they might consent to hold their cotton until it got to 16 or 18 cents, and would not sell for less than that. Would they come within the purview of this bill if enacted into law?

Mr. JONES. I will say frankly to the Senator that I have not looked into that matter very carefully. I can see a very great distinction between farmers' organizations and their operations and labor organizations and their operations. I confess that I can not see any difference between a combination of farmers for the purpose of raising the price of their products, which are commodities just the same as any other products are commodities, and a combination of merchants for the purpose of holding up the prices of their goods.

I think the farmers' organizations can not be put on the same plane and the same basis as labor organizations. While I think probably all that this provision does with reference to farmers' organizations is to recognize their legal existence purely for mutual help, yet if they go out and by combinations with reference to their commodities violate the Sherman law, like other instrumentalities they will be subject to the law just the same.

I think there is more reason to charge that this is class legislation with reference to farmers' organizations than with reference to labor organizations, although much can be said in favor of legislation putting them on a different basis from those who deal in merchandise and other commodities in the production of which they have had little to do. Just what the effect of this measure would be upon an operation of that kind by the farmers I am not prepared to say, except that I do not think it gives them any rights they do not now possess.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to call the Senator's attention to what I regard as a distinction between farmers and merchants and between the operations of farmers and the operations of merchants, having in view a common object—that is, merchants having in view the raising of prices of commodities of which they are in possession and farmers having in view the raising of prices of commodities which they themselves have produced and own.

Mr. JONES. The merchant may own the commodity, too.

Mr. HUGHES. He owns it, but he has not produced it.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; and the farmer may not have done anything personally. He may have hired help and all that, and they may have produced the crop.

Mr. HUGHES. But we all know what the farming situation is.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. We know the number of units into which it is broken up and know how it is next door to impossible to combine so many men into such a compact body as to have any real effect upon the price of the commodity. Does not the Senator think greater liberty of action should be permitted to combinations of men who are tilling the soil and bringing those products into existence by their own muscular efforts than to men who merely have to get control of a sum of money and with sufficient money and with merely a clerical force may be in a position to cover the whole of the country and materially affect prices?

I think, too, that we are making the same mistake in this legislation that was made originally in the case of the Sherman antitrust law. The authors of the Sherman antitrust law had one or two combinations in mind. At that time the Standard Oil Co. was just coming into public notice. Its practices were new in the economic world. Men were being put out of business, and the most extravagant charges were being made against the company. It was accused of blowing up its rivals' plants, of preventing the passage of pipe lines over States, of corrupting legislatures, and so forth. It was the only industrial combination in existence at that time that the people knew anything about or whose practices were repugnant. The Sherman law was aimed directly at that combination and possibly one other. These other industrial conditions have grown up since then, and they have come in contact with the law in a hundred places.

So it does seem to me that we ought to legislate with reference to labor organizations by themselves, and that we should legislate with reference to farmers' organizations by themselves. I think the farmers of the United States can not abuse the power of being permitted to combine for the purpose of preventing the price of their products from being unduly depressed.

We can take the chance that perhaps they will occasionally get a little bit above the true value of the product. That will happen so rarely that I should say the harm brought about by it would be infinitesimal and would be outweighed tremendously by the opportunity given to them to have a chance to get what their product is worth. Somebody said to me in the cloakroom the other day that the average farmer, the average cotton raiser in the State of Arkansas, was working for 22 cents a day. We know how they operate. They have to borrow money from the banks on notes, and they have to take the chance of the crop maturing. They have to get the help to garner it, and then they have to deal with men who make it their business and who have legislative machinery called into existence and invented for the purpose of depressing the price of their product when the time comes to market it and for raising the price of that product after the farmer has parted with it.

So it has always seemed to me, while I do not come from an agricultural State, and I am not particularly familiar with the agricultural business—there is only one farmer in our delegation—that to legislate for industrial combinations like the Standard Oil Co., the American Sugar Trust, the American Federation of Labor, and farmers' organizations in general terms was inviting trouble.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. WHITE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield, and to whom?

Mr. JONES. I yield first to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I just want to ask the Senator from New Jersey a question. If a farmers' organization to-day advises its members that a product at the present time is not receiving in the markets the price to which it is entitled, and that it would be well for the farmers to hold this kind of a product or that kind of a product for a few months, when the demand will be greater, or it will be best for them to sell now certain products because they will probably get a better price now for them than they would at any other time, does the Senator contend that any of those instructions coming from the farmers' organizations to their members would be repugnant to the antitrust laws?

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator is asking me a very difficult and embarrassing question. My view of the antitrust law is that it was intended to control industrial combinations which are familiarly called trusts. The study I have made of the history of the law and what was in the minds of the legislators at that time, and, as the Senator says, the best opinion of the courts of this country, confirms the view I have, I think—that it never was intended to control them and it does not control them at all.

So far as labor organizations and farmers' organizations are concerned, it is, in my opinion, as though the law had never been passed. It is true the farmers are still subject to the laws of their localities and that the labor organizations are still subject to the laws of their localities; but, so far as they and their operations are concerned, the law never had them in mind when it was passed. The authors of the law said so, and their statement is in the RECORD and can be read now.

I will say there are a great many people who take a view of that law which makes the acts cited by the Senator as supposed to have been done by farmers' organizations in flat violation of the law.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am asking the Senator if he believes they are in violation of the law as that law has been construed?

Mr. HUGHES. Even as it has been construed, as the Senator says, in one of the cases which went to the appellate division. As the Danbury Hat case has been construed, those things are in violation of the law. I want to tell my friend that many of the farmers of the United States are fearful that those acts are in violation of the law. The labor organizations of the country have had frequent prosecutions, some of which have never gone beyond an indictment, some of which have never reached the nisi prius court; but they are convinced that an unfriendly Attorney General could dissolve such organizations, at least as do the things the Senator has cited, and that there would not be any question about it in the case of organizations the members of which were engaged in transporting commodities between the States.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator from Washington will allow me, if the supposition of the Senator from New Jersey is correct, that this matter might come within the provisions of the antitrust law, then he could claim that every industrial publication which deals with steel or flour, which states to the members of their organizations what the supply in the world is to-day, and what the price perhaps will be to-morrow, and that they will probably receive a better price next spring than they are receiving at the present time, would be against the antitrust law. I do not believe that it would be, and I do not believe that under this provision the farmers would come within that law. Therefore the farmer gains nothing by this unless you can say he has a right to do an unlawful act with force and violence and intimidation, and wish to make that legal, and the farmer does not ask that such things shall be made legal.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish the Senator would not inject such terms into this discussion. If there was any force or violence or intimidation used by any party to any of these disputes, they do not wait for the Federal authority to interfere. The Federal authorities have no jurisdiction in those matters except in an indirect way. If I commit an act of violence by striking a man, his redress is that he immediately goes to the criminal court and seeks to have me punished for an assault. He is not going to wait until three or four men strike him and then attempt to prove that there is a conspiracy on foot to prevent him from doing business. He applies at once to the local courts; he makes complaint against me for assault, and I am indicted, tried, and convicted 99 times out of 100.

I do not see why the Senator should inject such terms in this discussion. There is no one here on either side of the Chamber who desires to give the farmers' or laborers' organizations or any other organizations the right to use violence, threats, intimidations, coercion, or force of any kind. I am willing to write that into this section now. It seems to me that we ought not to waste any more time on it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I only want to say, with the permission of the Senator from Washington, in the case just cited by the Senator, a case of intimidation, does the Senator claim that the courts had no right to take cognizance of that under the antitrust law?

Mr. HUGHES. I am not passing upon the decision at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am asking the Senator that question.

Mr. HUGHES. I am not familiar with the facts. If the Senator wants my opinion, I do not believe that the Federal courts could take cognizance of a case of violence when the violence was committed within a State. I think that could very well be left to the State courts. I do not think a man who is charged with violence should be dragged 100 miles to be tried and compelled to transport his witnesses. There is no excuse for dragging those things into this discussion. The State courts have jurisdiction of those cases. If I assault a man, and if I am a member of a thousand labor unions, I assault him somewhere in the United States, in some State, some county, some municipality, and I am subject to be punished for it.

Mr. McCUMBER. This is not a question of assault. It was simply a question of fact.

Mr. HUGHES. Against the laws of the State.

Mr. McCUMBER. Can the farmer break his contracts? I say the farmer is not asking for that kind of a law.

Mr. HUGHES. There is no law of the United States of that sort which prevents intimidation, and there is not a State in the Union that does not prevent it.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator permit me an interruption? I wish to ask the Senator from North Dakota if the passage of the bill in its present form would interfere in another case similar to the Steers case, the court doing what it did there?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think so.

Mr. CLAPP. Then it strikes me that the inquiry was hardly apt.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know how it may strike the Senator, but it strikes me that the whole thing is being used as a sop to indicate that the farmer has a right which the Senator admits and which I admit he has not under this bill, and which he is not asking under this bill. That is my criticism.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JONES. Is it about this colloquy?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES. Very well; because I want to make a remark about this colloquy.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to make this suggestion, differentiating farmers from merchants: The farmers create something. They create a commodity by their labor. They enrich the world to the extent of their creation, while the merchant simply exchanges these commodities between sellers and consumers. He is a mere medium of exchange. It seems to me, for that reason, a clear distinction exists between farmers and merchants, and that on that account alone farmers ought to be taken out of that class and not treated in legislation with that class. They are like miners; they produce something.

Mr. GALLINGER. What about manufacturers?

Mr. WHITE. They do not create anything in reality. They simply add value to something which already exists.

Mr. GALLINGER. Just about what the farmer does when he digs his potatoes.

Mr. WHITE. He plants potatoes before he digs them, and he has to wait for God and the rain and himself combined to make potatoes, and then he gets them.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama a question. I recognize the distinction he makes. I want to say that I do not see any difference among the four of us Senators here with reference to this provision of the law. I want to ask the Senator what he understands this provision gives to the farmer that he has not now?

Mr. WHITE. It gives him confidence; that is all.

Mr. JONES. Then there is no difference.

Mr. WHITE. It gives him assurance that in what he does he will not be in the dark. It removes a cloud from his title. It clears up the situation and lets him understand what he may do, and it is worth a vast deal not only to the farmer but to the laborer that the situation may be clarified, that they may know exactly what they are doing. I do not think it confers upon him a single right that he does not now in fact have, but I think it makes that right better understood.

Mr. JONES. I have always believed heartily in the proposition of confidence, and so there is no difference between the Senator and me.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. I will yield in just a moment. As I said a moment ago, I do not think there is any difference between myself and the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from North Dakota and the Senator from Alabama on this matter at all. Under this legislation we do not give any right to the farmers that they do not now have, except I am going to call attention a little later to one particular thing that I think possibly we do give to them and to labor organizations that they do not have now. Now I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. I rose for the purpose of presenting to the Senator from Washington a parallel to see if he can make the distinction. I take the great sawmills out of the list, the stationary sawmills. It is well known that there are tens of thousands of portable mills over the country that perhaps do not cost a thousand dollars apiece, carriage, boiler, engine, and all. The engine is usually attached to the boiler.

What would be the difference in these tens of thousands of little portable sawmills over the country and the farmers, where the average farmer would be worth more than the average sawmill man, if they combine together, without any money being put up, and say, "We will put up the price of our product," just like the wheat people or the cotton people say, "We will put up the price of our wheat or our cotton"? Can the Senator from Washington draw a distinction between the farmers and the owners of the little portable sawmills?

Mr. JONES. I am not trying to draw any particular distinction. In one way I do not see any very great distinction. I recognize this, however——

Mr. WEST. Why the difference, then, in legislation for different classes? I am a farmer; I raise a whole lot of produce; but I can not see why that should differentiate me in my favor against some other class of people.

Mr. JONES. I just stated a moment ago that I do not believe this provision gives them any rights that they have not now, and it does not take away from the little mill owners any rights that they have now.

Mr. WEST. Why cumber the statute books, then?

Mr. JONES. I suggested a while ago, especially with reference to labor, that there is a difference of opinion with reference to what a combination or an association of labor is. Some prominent lawyers say the mere fact of the existence of an organization of labor is of itself a violation of the Sherman law. I do not think there is anything to that, and the only purpose of this legislation is to set at rest in a legislative way that particular question. It is a legislative construction that these farmers' organizations may exist without violating the Sherman law; it simply makes certain what some able men have doubted; that is all.

I recognize the force of the suggestions made by the Senator from New Jersey and the other Senators here with reference to the different conditions under which the farmer and the small operators labor and work, and it presents a strong case for different legislation for them. I think all the Senators overlook the fact that no matter what some Senators thought or said when the antitrust law was passed, we must construe that law as it passed, and it makes no exception because of any particular conditions under which these men or those belonging to different occupations have to labor. Without going over what I said in the first part of my address, I will simply call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey to the fact that while a bill was introduced containing, I think, a provision exempting labor organizations and farmer organizations, or at least such a provision was offered to the bill, and some Senators, when that was pending, contended that the law should not apply to such organizations, as a matter of fact that exception was not put in the law, and there were some prominent Senators who said that the exemption ought not to be made. So whatever our personal views may be as to what course ought to have been taken, we must take the law as it passed and not as we think it ought to have passed or as some thought it ought to be passed.

Mr. HUGHES. I simply want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the amendment when it was offered was passed unanimously by the Senate.

Mr. JONES. That is true; but there are lots of amendments that the Senate passes which never become law.

Mr. HUGHES. There was, as I recollect, no Senator who held the view that the exception should not be made.

Mr. JONES. That may be true, although I think some did express opposition. It may not have been expressed.

Mr. HUGHES. A great many Senators held the view that there was no necessity for making the exception, that it could not by any possibility be construed to apply to the organizations, and finally when the amendment was offered there was not a single vote against it, the author of the legislation accepting the amendment and declaring it to be a fair legislative inference that they should be excepted.

Mr. JONES. That is true; but both Houses have to do with the passing of the law and the law did not pass with that amendment and with that provision.

When I say this I am not arguing now that it ought not to be passed or that we ought not to treat the farmers and farmers' organizations in a different way from the great commercial organizations of the country. If we want to do it, we ought to make the provision as we want it and not leave it to the courts or by uncertain language impose this burden on the courts. I am simply suggesting this as a sort of defense of the courts, that I think have been reflected upon very unjustly simply because we have not done our duty.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator for his enlightening view upon another feature of these organizations. As far as I know, the hens of the United States are laying eggs in their usual number, without any change on account of the war. I do not know of any demand that is being made particularly for American eggs for foreign shipment. Suppose the grocers and market men here conclude that as an excuse for raising the price of eggs they shall use this war argument when, as a matter of fact, they may be purchased for the same old price. Here is a consumers' league which organizes and declares that these people are charging exorbitant prices, prices that they ought not to charge—that their reasons for raising the price are unjustifiable—and they advise their associations not to purchase unless they bring those eggs down to a reasonable price, which price they may fix. Does the Senator think that that ought to be an unlawful organization? I notice that by a vote yesterday you prohibited them, so far as you could, from so organizing.

Mr. JONES. The Senator did not examine the details of that vote. If he did, he would find that I voted against that proposition.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know the Senator was right. I examined it simply enough to know that you prohibited the consumers' leagues, which are struggling not against the laboring men, not against the farmer in his prices, but to prevent the combination and organizations of the middlemen from fixing exorbitant prices. Now, does the Senator believe that if we had legalized them the same as we have the farmers' organizations and the labor organizations that we would have exempted them from the effect of the antitrust law?

Mr. JONES. If I thought so, I would not have voted as I did. I voted with the Senator on that proposition. Of course, the Senator and I both agree that this provision does not add anything to what they have, that it does not give the farmers anything; and cutting the word "consumers" out does not take anything from them. I think they have the right still to form those organizations, but I think, as we are putting these others in, we ought to leave those in, too.

Mr. McCUMBER. It was a sentiment against the consumer, and they must accept it as such.

Mr. JONES. I think it was more a disposition to stand by the committee. I think probably that had more to do with controlling the votes of the Senate than anything else. The committee recommended it, and the Senate so voted, not because they were against the consumers but because they wanted to stand by the committee.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Loewe against Lawlor the Sherman Act was practically held to apply to organizations of farmers and to laborers generally. If the Senator will yield, I will read a paragraph from the opinion.

Mr. JONES. I shall be very glad to have any information on the subject.

Mr. CULBERSON. In the case of Loewe against Lawlor, Two hundred and eighth United States, page 301, in the opinion delivered by Chief Justice Fuller, it is said:

> Nor can the act in question be held inapplicable because defendants were not themselves engaged in interstate commerce. The act made no distinction between classes. It provided that "every" contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade was illegal. The records of Congress show that several efforts were made to exempt, by legislation, organizations of farmers and laborers from the operation of the act and that all these efforts failed, so that the act remained as we have it before us.

I read that to suggest that the same reason exists for passing this bill with respect to farmers' organizations as for labor organizations per se, inasmuch as the Supreme Court in this opinion said, in effect, that they were within the provisions of the antitrust law.

Mr. JONES. Of course the question with reference to farmers was not directly involved in that case.

Mr. CULBERSON. It was dictum, but it throws a cloud over the right of farmers to that extent.

Mr. JONES. I understand that. The court even in that case did not hold the existence of the labor organization per se to be in violation of the Sherman Act.

Mr. CULBERSON. No; it did not, but they used the expression "organization of laborers" and held, in effect, that they were within the operation of the law under certain circumstances.

Mr. JONES. Well, section 7 will not take them out under certain circumstances either; they will still be subject to the Sherman law under certain conditions if they do certain acts, will they not?

Mr. CULBERSON. No more than anyone else.

Mr. JONES. Oh, well, I understand that, of course. I shall point out in a moment what I think is the real difference in this section, and then I shall ask the Senator what is his view with reference to the particular point that I shall make.

Mr. President, some of the friends of this provision admit that it is class legislation. I do not think it is; but even if it is, that is no valid reason against it if it is desirable legislation. There are very few laws passed by Congress that are not class legislation, that do not benefit some of our people more than others; that do not benefit one section of the country more than another. Many instances of such legislation have been enumerated by those who have spoken upon the question, and I shall not go over the ground again. The great expanse of our country, the diversity of our industries, the varied occupations of our people make class legislation necessary and inevitable. If those who contend that the mere existence of a labor organization is a violation of the Sherman law are correct, then there is a class distinction now in that commercial organizations are not per se violations of that law, and this legislation is justified on this ground if on no other.

Those who oppose this legislation and urge us not to pass it must believe that it exempts labor organizations and their members from prosecutions for acts done beyond what they have a legal right to do for the purpose of unreasonably restraining trade or commerce. It does not do this, and such acts can be prosecuted just the same after the passage of this provision as before, either, in my judgment, under the Sherman law or under other laws of a local or a national character affecting these acts. It may be—and this is the point I want to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to—that for such acts an organization could now be dissolved, while after the passage of this provision it might not be; but even if this is so, it could be restrained from doing the unlawful acts, and then there could be no objection to its continuance as an organization. In other words, under the Sherman law an organization that is found guilty of restraining trade can be dissolved; and I take it that if a labor organization should be held now to have restrained trade, the court could dissolve such organization.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Texas if this section is adopted and then a labor organization should be held to have violated the Sherman law by reason of intimidation or coercion or acts of that character which are beyond the legitimate purposes of the organization and its lawful scope whether this provision would not exempt it from dissolution and whether the courts would not probably restrain those acts and then let the organization continue in existence?

Mr. CULBERSON. I think, Mr. President, that would depend somewhat upon whether or not the amendment proposed by the committee inserting the word "lawfully" is adopted.

Mr. JONES. I mean if the amendment is adopted.

Mr. CULBERSON. It would depend on whether the amendment proposed by the Judiciary Committee inserting the word "lawfully" is adopted. I think in that case, where the organization exists and is pursuing the legitimate objects of the organization in a lawful manner, it could not be dissolved or, rather, declared unlawful or restrained by an injunction of a Federal court.

Mr. JONES. The point I am suggesting is this: Suppose that they do something unlawful. Suppose they do unlawful acts, then the court could restrain them from doing those acts.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think so, so far as this bill is concerned.

Mr. JONES. But would it not have to stop there, or could it go on and dissolve the organization?

Mr. CULBERSON. Not in my judgment. The court would not be authorized to dissolve the organization.

Mr. JONES. That is my point, and that is the suggestion that I am making. That, in my judgment, is the only substantial change made by this provision in existing conditions. Under conditions now existing the court could dissolve the organization, while if this provision is passed and a labor organization should commit some unlawful act the court could stop those unlawful acts. There it must stop and let the organization continue its existence. I think that is quite a substantial right and quite a substantial provision, but one that will not in any way interfere with interstate trade or commerce.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, in what way would the court stop such an organization—by fine or imprisonment?

Mr. JONES. I suppose so, or by injunction or something of that sort.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator from Washington a question right there?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator from Washington contend that if a labor organization is organized for lawful purposes and for very many good purposes, and is proceeding in the exercise of its functions according to its organization, because it may break the law in one respect, the court, under present laws, can go further than an injunction and dissolve it and prevent it from performing its usual functions?

Mr. JONES. I do not believe that any reasonable court would do so; but I fear the court could do so if it saw fit to exercise that power.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, upon what theory could a court exercise such power? Of course, where a body of men come together primarily in the form of a conspiracy or combination in restraint of trade the very coming together is the initiation of the act prohibited; of course, that can be further prevented by dissolving their associations, but where a body of men, whether a labor organization or any other body of men, lawfully organized and ordinarily pursuing a lawful course of action, should in some particular violate the law I am at a total loss to understand how the court may invoke the power of dissolution.

Mr. JONES. Here is the point—and I suggest it more to get information and the views of Senators than anything else—if some court should find that a labor organization has violated the Sherman law, and it were disposed to do so, it could make a finding that it is a conspiracy, and under that finding, of course, dissolve it.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, let us eliminate for a moment labor organizations.

Mr. JONES. That is the main thing I am talking about.

Mr. CLAPP. Let us take a copartnership or a firm that has been doing a legitimate business and is legitimately organized. There is no relation between its original organization and the circumstance that two or three years later it may do something that is a violation of the Sherman antitrust law. If in the course of their business they should transgress the Sherman antitrust law clearly a court would not dissolve the copartnership. It would restrain them from continuing that particular act which constituted a violation of the law.

Mr. JONES. I think that is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. The court could not dissolve the partnership.

Mr. CLAPP. The court could not do so.

Mr. JONES. I think that is true.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. In line with the Senator's suggestion, if a case were pending in a court of equity, and one of these organizations should continue to violate the law, might not a court of equity, in order to give complete relief, even go behind what prompted the immediate act and destroy the agency that is continuing the violation? That is the idea, as I understand, suggested by the Senator from Washington, that the court would have the power to decree dissolution, but would be exceedingly loath to do so.

Mr. JONES. I think so. The real idea that I have in mind is this: Suppose a labor organization is charged with conspiracy and the court finds that it has been guilty of a conspiracy, as I understand, under the Sherman law now it could be dissolved. I will ask the Senator from Minnesota if that is correct?

Mr. CLAPP. The conspiracy could be dissolved. If a labor organization, a copartnership, or a corporation join with others in a conspiracy, that conspiracy could be dissolved, and the parties to that conspiracy would return to their constituent elements as a firm, a corporation, or a labor organization, as the case may be. Suppose that a dozen men are engaged in legitimate business, and they form a conspiracy under the Sherman antitrust law, and the court finds them guilty; the court will then enjoin them and dissolve that conspiracy, but each one of those dozen men can then go on and pursue his lawful business.

Mr. JONES. Let me ask the Senator another question. I have not a well-settled conviction about this matter, and I want to get the Senator's views. As I understand—I may be mistaken—there was some case brought against a labor organization in which it was charged with being a conspiracy, and the court issued a decree dissolving the organization. I do not know the facts; they have come to me in a sort of general way like the facts in the case cited by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], and I have not investigated the case to ascertain what the real facts are; but suppose that that is correct, and that the court did find such an organization a conspiracy and dissolved the organization into its original members. I assume under the existing Sherman law it would not be necessary for the court to take such action; it could enjoin that organization from violating the law as it had conspired to do, and thereby prevent its violation, and that would really accomplish the purpose sought; but suppose this provision is passed, then could the court go further than enjoining the commission of those unlawful acts and dissolve the actual existing organization as a conspiracy as it is reported it did in that case?

Mr. CLAPP. If the court could do it in the one case, then it could do it in the other. If a group of men, under the guise of calling themselves a labor organization or the United States Steel Co. or any name they may assume, unite together in a conspiracy in restraint of trade, that combination could be dissolved, and it could be dissolved just as readily, in my judgment, after the passage of this bill as before. It is a question of the purpose of the organization.

Mr. JONES. That illustrates the uncertainty of the provisions of this bill as well as of other bills. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], as I understand, holds the other way. I am rather inclined to the view of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Washington for a moment?

Mr. JONES. Certainly; I have lots of time.

Mr. CUMMINS. The nearest approach to a decree of the character mentioned by the Senator from Washington with which I am familiar is the decree entered by Judge Dayton in West Virginia, and that decree was, in fact, based upon the common law and not upon the statutes of the United States which we are now considering. The circuit court of appeals, however, reversed that decree, holding that the labor organization involved in that case was not in violation in and of itself either of the common law or the statute of 1890. Even that decree was not wholly dissociated from the act of the individual members and officers of the organization; but I think that Judge Dayton's opinion and decree might well be accepted as a holding that the labor union was—in this case the United Mine Workers—in and of itself, on account of the objects which were declared in the articles of association, an unlawful organization. Then, of course, the court proceeded to consider what had been done and what was proposed to be done, but the decision was promptly reversed by the circuit court of appeals, in which the whole subject is reviewed, and in their opinion it is distinctly and positively held that labor unions, having in view the purposes for which that organization was created, were not violations of the antitrust law as being in restraint of trade, nor were they opposed to the common law, and the court drew a very sharp distinction between the common law as it was formerly understood in England and the common law as it had been accepted in the United States, expressly declaring that we had never adopted the harsh and rigorous rules which appeared to have favor in the early days of England.

Mr. JONES. Now, Mr. President, let me ask the Senator—because I have very great respect for his opinion with reference to these matters—does he think that the court could under the law as it now exists, if it found that a labor union because of acts which it had committed was guilty of conspiracy, dissolve the union?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator is now asking my individual opinion?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I premise it by saying that it never has been done, and the declarations of all courts which are really entitled to respect are to the effect that it can not be done; but I am perfectly aware that the construction of a statute is a matter of development, and personally I have been apprehensive that there might be found a court some time that would declare that an association of men having for their avowed object the increase of their compensation as wageworkers is an unlawful combination or conspiracy.

I have been apprehensive of that because up to this time the courts have not seemed to take account of the real character of a labor union. That is, they have not drawn the distinction between labor and commodities which I think must be drawn in order to reach the conclusion logically that a labor union is not a violation of the antitrust law. The very moment you assume that labor is a commodity and that to suppress competition or limit competition in labor is a restraint of trade, as it would be if it concerned a commodity, we are upon very dangerous ground. It is because I would like to see that distinction drawn, and labor recognized as not being a commodity, that I am in favor of this section, or, rather, to speak accurately, I am in favor of a substitute for it, which I suggested yesterday.

Mr. JONES. I agree entirely with the Senator, and I want to ask him a question. Would the passage of this section as recommended by the committee remove the apprehension he has expressed?

Mr. CUMMINS. Yes. I think the passage of the section will remove this danger. It will make it clear that a labor organization—assuming now that the words are construed to mean a union of wageworkers having for its object the increase of wages, the betterment of conditions, and the lessening of hours of work—is not in and of itself a restraint of trade. I think that must be accepted as the effect of this section; but the moment you pass beyond that and enter any activity of an officer of the association or a member of the association I think the section does nothing at all. I think the word "lawfully," which has been reported by the committee and, I understand, is now before the Senate for rejection or adoption, limits the activities or acts or doings of any such association to just such as are now authorized by the law.

Mr. JONES. I am very glad to have the opinion of the Senator, because it is squarely to the point and presents the issue squarely, I think.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Iowa if any court has ever held or ever intimated that the sale by a man of his labor is a commercial act?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I think no court has ever so held.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator really think there is danger of a court ever holding that the mere hiring of a man to an employer is an act of commerce?

Mr. CUMMINS. There are a great many opinions which contain discussions of the subject and which will be found to embrace a course of reasoning which, if carried to its logical end, would put labor precisely where you put a bale of cotton or a bushel of wheat; but those reasons have never found expression in any decision. It never has been so decided. I confess that I have shared the apprehension that some students of the subject have—that the courts may do that in the future.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in my judgment, it would be better for us to take some such course as that suggested by the Senator from Iowa. Let the Sherman law affect trade and commerce and those who deal in and with trade and commerce as it, in fact, was intended when it was passed. Take labor and labor organizations out from under the law entirely, and let us formulate a statute governing labor and its organizations. Let us define its rights and place upon it certain fair and just limitations. Then will we indeed give to labor its magna charta upon which can be builded a code of laws under which labor's rights can be fully protected and a fairer and more equitable share of the products of its toil secured. We can devote our time to no more important and beneficent legislation than that which seeks to solve fairly and justly the tremendous problems affecting the relations of labor to those engaged in interstate trade and commerce. They are the problems which affect the very lives and existence of hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children, and their proper solution means happiness, peace, comfort, and prosperity to millions of individual citizens and stability and safety to our industries and institutions.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the difficulty with the suggestion just made by the Senator from Washington is that, except as the relations of an employer and an employee are connected with commerce or trade, we have no jurisdiction to deal with them at all. We are powerless to prepare and enact a code which shall govern the rights of wageworkers and of employers except as that relation is involved in the commerce of the country, for we must draw our authority from the provision of the Constitution which gives us the right to regulate commerce among the States. All that we can do in this connection and with respect to this subject, as I view it, is to see that labor is not improperly involved in commerce; that is to say, that we, in our efforts to regulate commerce, do not attempt to draw within our regulation a thing that is not commerce at all, and never can be made commerce, and ought not to be made commerce.

Mr. JONES. I am very glad the Senator interrupted me there, because I had that distinction in mind, although I know I did not express it. What I intended to say, of course, is that within the limits of our jurisdiction we should treat labor and its relations to interstate trade as really an independent proposition, in so far as we can. Of course we can not disassociate it from interstate trade and commerce, because, as the Senator says, it is only in that relation that we have jurisdiction over it, but we must define the rights of labor so far as it affects commerce, or, at least, we ought to do it, keeping in mind its character and condition and not deal with it as a commodity, as commerce. That was what I had in mind when I said we should separate it and legislate for it, of course in its relation to interstate trade and commerce, but not treat it, as the Senator says, as an article of commerce, because it is not an article of commerce. It is no part of commerce. It is not a commodity at all.

I would not weaken the Sherman law in its application to the conditions and operations which it was really intended to affect. It should stand in all the force and vigor which the courts have given it against these practices in restraint of the distribution of the commodities of commerce which it was intended to prevent. I would, however, lend every reasonable encouragement and proper assistance for the improvement of the conditions and a better and fairer compensation of those upon whose shoulders rest the very foundations of society and civilization, through whose toil and sweat and effort commerce and trade are possible and upon whose well-being and contentment depend largely the peace, prosperity, and progress of society. If nothing better is offered, I shall vote without hesitation for the provisions of section 7 of this proposed act.

I want to apologize to the Senate for taking more than 20 or 30 minutes, as I promised at the beginning of my remarks; but I doubt if this apology is necessary, in view of the interruptions that those who have been here know about.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, the Senate was accessory before the fact to the offense of the prolongation of the Senator's remarks. There is no question about that.

I want to say just a word in regard to section 7. It not infrequently happens that Congress and some others indulge in a sort of a shadow dance—get up in the clouds and wage a combat there, and after all the smoke has cleared away it is discovered that it was not a very vital combat after all.

I am inclined to think we are now in that sort of a combat. I do not believe there is a lawyer in this body or outside of this body who will seriously contend that section 7 modifies existing law up to the point that law has been construed to this time. I believe the Senate, generally speaking, and the public, generally speaking, will agree to a proposition that could not be more tersely and plainly stated than it was stated by the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] in his proposed amendment to section 7:

> That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce.

And if not a commodity or article of commerce, then clearly it is not the subject of the laws designed to prevent the destruction of competition in articles of trade and commerce.

The Senators who oppose section 7 insist with one breath that it adds nothing to the law, that it is simply a sop thrown to labor, and in the next breath some, at least, insist that it is throwing open wide the doors to anarchy and lawlessness. The fact is it is neither the one nor the other; it is only making plain what is now accepted by all as the law, although there is outside of Congress an impression that section 7 gives some rights that do not now exist, as is evidenced by the mass of telegrams and letters received not only by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], but, I think, by every Member of this body. These telegrams and letters are based upon the assumption that section 7 confers certain rights and enlarges certain liberties beyond the legal status of labor organizations as they exist in the absence of section 7.

Now, while this assumption is an error, while it is true section 7 neither enlarges nor restricts the right of men to form labor unions, yet in view of the impression that section 7 does make some change, it has always been a theory of mine—perhaps too plain and fundamental to invite any great amount of attention—that one of the duties in enacting legislation is to make legislation just as plain and positive as it can be made. Aside from the evils that may result from unwise and unjust laws comes the great evil of the uncertainty of law. The Senator from Washington this morning, in a form that attracted my attention by its simplicity, and yet with a logic of reasoning that was also a marvel, pointed out that the fault is not so often with the court as it is with the legislature. We pass laws about which we ourselves differ as to the use and application of the terms, and then courts are criticized because of their interpretation of the laws.

Being one of those who believe that there is nothing in section 7 which changes existing law, but recognizing that there must be abroad an impression that the right of labor to-day is not the right as measured by section 7, I for one have no hesitation whatever in casting my vote for section 7, unless it may be improved by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], which I think is an improvement, thereby making plain and certain, as far as human language can do so, what is intended by the legislation.

It may be said that if this is already the law there is no necessity for repeating it; but the pouring in of telegrams and letters would indicate that there is an impression that this is not the law. I can see no reason why we should not, and, on the other hand, every reason why we should, make this so plain and certain that there can be no longer any doubt about it.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. CHILTON. I want to make a suggestion to the Senator. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa is for us to define labor as not being a commodity. If it is not a commodity, or if it is not commerce, upon what theory can we enact eight-hour laws under our grant of power to regulate interstate commerce? How are we going to reconcile the votes we have made?

I should like to say beforehand that I should like to make that declaration. I feel like making it. I wish the Congress could. But I am afraid we are going to do more damage to labor and more injury to humanity by making that kind of a broad declaration than we can possibly do good to labor.

We have passed a lot of eight-hour laws, a lot of regulations as to interstate commerce where they affected labor, and they have received the approval of labor. They are humanitarian. Suppose we make a declaration that under no circumstances can labor be construed as a commodity, that means that in no way can it be a part of interstate commerce, and do we not injure it by that declaration much more than we will benefit it? Ought we not to get at it in the other way?

Mr. CLAPP. There is a vast difference between declaring an article is not the subject of commerce and regulating the instrumentalities and agencies of commerce. For instance, we passed a law prohibiting labor for more than a certain number of hours in interstate commerce, and we passed laws for protection of the life of those who are being transported. That has no earthly relation to the question whether labor be an article of commerce.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator tell me where is the grant of the power to Congress to do that except the interstate-commerce clause? Will the Senator kindly point out to me the clause in the Constitution authorizing us to prescribe the number of hours men shall work or labor? The States have a right to do it. We ought to have probably the power, but where is it?

Mr. CLAPP. The Senator is insistent upon asking a question when there can be no question about it. Of course, under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, we get the power to regulate interstate commerce. Nobody claims that we can get it anywhere else.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator has answered as I thought he would. If the thing we are regulating is interstate commerce, how can we regulate it?

Mr. CLAPP. The character of the rails that may be run over is not commerce, it is one of the instrumentalities of commerce. We can require that the rails shall be of a given thickness and a given strength, and we can require safety appliances on cars. That is not commerce. It is one of the instrumentalities of commerce. There are a thousand things involved in the regulation of interstate commerce where these things themselves are not the subject of commerce.

Mr. CHILTON. Then, would the Senator say that labor is an instrumentality of interstate commerce?

Mr. CLAPP. It may be so related to interstate commerce that under our power to regulate interstate commerce we can regulate the application of labor, as we do in regard to the hours of labor which we prescribe.

Mr. CUMMINS rose.

Mr. CHILTON. In the committee we have discussed this with the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I know how he has contended for it, but that has been the trouble I have had with it. I want to go along in a way that will do them some practical good.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I interpose for a moment?

Mr. CLAPP. I will yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will trespass only a moment. The distinction between the cases put by the Senator from West Virginia and the declaration that labor is not a commodity to me is very apparent. When we regulate a railway company or prescribe rules for the operation of an instrumentality of commerce we are not regulating labor, we are regulating the railroad company and prescribing the conditions upon which it shall engage in interstate commerce. One of those conditions may be that it will not employ any man for more than 8 hours or 10 hours or 12 hours continuously. That is in no sense a recognition that labor is a commodity or an article of commerce. It is simply a rule put upon the railroad company that is engaged in commerce in order to render its operations more efficient or safer.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. In the same way, if we have the power, which I think we have, to regulate a corporation engaged in general industry and also engaged in interstate commerce, I think we can say to that corporation, "You shall not engage in interstate commerce if you do so and so." I think we can say to it that its capital stock must be paid up. I think we can say to it that it must not be in collusion with or have a community of directors with another company that is also engaged in interstate commerce. I think we can say to it that it shall not employ its men or women more than a certain number of hours per day. All these things, however, have no connection with the essential character of the thing that we call labor.

Mr. CHILTON. Yet does not the Senator remember that the substance of his amendment is practically one of the arguments made against the opponents of the eight-hour law?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all.

Mr. CHILTON. I have read the argument to very poor purpose, then.

Mr. CLAPP. I confess I never heard it made. On the contrary, it was claimed time and time before our committee that we should do these things in the interest of the traveling public.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] that legislation should be made as clear and as free from ambiguity as language will permit. Yet that is sometimes one of the most difficult things to accomplish. This difficulty arises from the meaning of which words in the English language in combination with other words is susceptible, constructions which never occurred to the legislator in framing the statute.

I recall that the first bankruptcy act passed by Congress was framed by Justice Story, of the Supreme Court, at the request of one or the other of the two Houses. He was one of the greatest masters of legal expression that the bar of this or any other country ever produced. He gave a vast deal of time and anxious thought to the preparation of a bankruptcy law, and Congress very wisely adopted and enacted the bill which he had drafted without any change whatever. A case involving the consideration of an important section of that act came before the Supreme Court at the time when Story was one of its illustrious members. After listening to Mr. Webster's argument relating to the application of that section to the facts involved he was compelled to declare that he himself did not know what it meant. In line with this thought it occurs to me that section 7 of this bill contains one ambiguity that seems to me to be obvious, although it is perhaps not of very serious importance. I refer to the last paragraph:

> Nor shall such organizations or the members thereof be held or construed to be illegal combinations.

I am not able to understand how an individual can be charged with or convicted of being an illegal combination. Combinations necessarily involve numbers, more than one, at least. Yet there is a provision here that the members of organizations shall not be held or construed to be illegal combinations.

As I said, Mr. President, I do not know that that is of any particular importance, but nevertheless it is an expression which ought not to appear in a carefully considered statute.

Mr. President, I have given much thought to section 7, and from time to time have considered its provisions since it was reported from the House committee and thus became a part of the bill which has attracted universal public attention. I think that that section as it has been amended here corresponds to the Democratic pledge upon the subject, and I am still old-fashioned enough to want to adhere to the platform of my party wherever it is possible. My faith in it receives an occasional severe jolt, but still I think it is making fairly good progress over a rough road.

I was tempted on Monday morning to suggest a change in our party declaration that "a private monopoly is indefensible and intolerable," by excepting the Coastwise Shipping Trust from its provisions, and I am satisfied that the logic of the situation fully justifies the acknowledgment of such an exception. My own conscience, however, being clear, I am not yet prepared to accept the vote of my colleagues as indicative of the feeling of my party upon the subject.

Mr. President, I was a member of the Democratic national convention of 1908, which met in my city. My delegation did me the honor to place me upon the committee on resolutions, which reported that platform to the convention, where it was adopted. Among other things we said:

> The expanding organization of industry makes it essential that there should be no abridgment of the right of wage earners and producers to organize for the protection of wages and the improvement of labor conditions, to the end that such labor organizations and their members should not be regarded as illegal combinations in restraint of trade.

The convention of 1912 adopted that plank of the platform in 1908 in hæc verba, so that our attitude upon the subject in 1908 was our attitude in 1912 and should be our attitude here. That declaration was inspired by the fact that the courts ever since the case of the United States v. Workingmen's Amalgamated Council (54 Fed., 994), which arose in the State of Louisiana, have been inclined to hold and have held in several instances that labor organizations were per se organizations in restraint of trade and therefore obnoxious to the provisions and prohibitions of the Sherman Act. The object of the Democratic Party in this platform declaration was to provide against that contention by legislation necessary for the purpose, so that as far as the labor organization was concerned it should start out upon the same plane and occupy the same position held and occupied by a corporation. And that object is subserved by this section if my construction of it is the correct one.

But, Mr. President, after listening to the arguments on this floor upon the meaning and effect of this section, it has occurred to me that its recitals are not commonly understood, and that too great latitude has been given to its provisions. Notably, on yesterday the declaration was made on at least two occasions to the effect that if section 7 was enacted into law it would wholly exempt labor and agricultural organizations from the operation of the antitrust act.

Mr. President, whatever else we may do we can not afford to enact legislation that is going to prove a disappointment in its practical operation, and this will prove to be a disappointment if statements of that sort are allowed to go unchallenged, because I do not believe that this section does or that it should wholly exempt any class of citizens completely and permanently from the operation of the general statutes of the country. Such legislation is dangerous in the extreme, and the more dangerous in that it is bound to become a precedent upon which other classes and other interests will found their subsequent contentions for similar legislation to the ultimate undoing of free institutions, for I think it may be stated as a general proposition that no legislation, unless it becomes absolutely unavoidable, should be enacted of a general character which does not have a general application. Privilege is founded and based upon class legislation, and so far as class legislation exists privilege will continue. The essence of equality depends upon the absence or extinction of privilege, and privilege can not thrive in the atmosphere of general legislation designed for the benefit and made applicable in its requirements to the duties and responsibilities of all.

Mr. President, I am justified, I think, in taking up a little time of this body and in giving my views concerning this section, because the courts have been justly censured for giving a construction to the Sherman Act in its application to labor organizations which is said to be entirely inconsistent with the declarations of its framers at and before the time of its enactment. Men say, and they say with great justice, that this law was never designed to apply to organizations of men, because distinguished Senators so declare, and one of them offered an amendment to that effect at the time of its enactment which would have been adopted but for the impression that such an amendment was not necessary. Hence there has been bitter feeling, much in the way of reproach and of injustice, because of the operation of the law when contrasted with these preceding statements.

For one, Mr. President, I do not want to be a party to the enactment of a law the operation of which is going to prove disappointing to those who may build so much upon it, and inasmuch as I think this statute merely declares that organizations per se shall not be obnoxious to the antitrust law, I deem it important both to my party and myself that I give my views as to the meaning and effect of this section.

It declares:

That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations instituted for the purpose of mutual help—

And so forth. But for the decisions to which I have referred that declaration would not be necessary. It is not necessary that we should here say that nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of corporations, because corporations as such are not forbidden to exist by law. Corporations are as free to organize and carry on their legitimate business since, as they were before, the enactment of the antitrust law, and when in this section we declare that nothing in the antitrust law shall forbid the existence and operation of agricultural and labor unions, we simply say that these organizations and the corporations shall stand on the same equality, shall occupy the same level, and may exist as such without running counter to the provisions of the antitrust law. Let us proceed:

instituted for the purpose of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

The effect of this section is to neutralize and to render inoperative those decisions of the class to which I have referred, which declare or tend to declare that these organizations are in themselves organizations in restraint of trade, and therefore subject to dissolution.

The fact of existence, their status, in other words, is fixed by this section, and in so far as their objects are legitimate and in the pursuit of them legitimate measures are used, there can be no conflict with the antitrust laws. The same thing may be said of corporations great and small. But beyond that, Mr. President, this section does not go. The thing itself is legalized. Whether it comes under the provisions of the antitrust law depends upon its future conduct, which may or may not be offensive to those statutes.

The union can do nothing, in other words, that the corporation can not do under this statute if it proposes to steer clear of the antitrust laws. The corporation can do anything that the labor union may do and keep out of the clutches of the antitrust law. Its purpose, in other words, Mr. President, is to create an equality of status, and beyond that the general laws of the country are operative.

I think, Mr. President, that so far as strikes are concerned they can not be punished or prevented by anything contained in the antitrust law if this section is adopted. I say that first, because I am aware of no court in the country except in cases involving the operation of some of our public transportation companies—and those decisions are, to some extent, obsolete—which declares that ceasing to work either individually or collectively is an offense against the laws of the country. And I question whether a lockout, unless designed to restrain commerce, is not lawful also.

It is a fundamental principle that every man in this country is entitled to work if he wants to. It is an equally fundamental principle that every man in the country is entitled to abstain from working if he wants to, and the denial of either of these rights is necessarily a denial of the other, and will logically lead to the abolition of both. They must coexist or they will mutually disappear.

So that the act of striking—which is negative in that its primary operation is such whether universal, whether communal, or individual—is perfectly proper under this law as it should be a recognized legal right of the citizen everywhere without it.

For example, if the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen after the enactment of this statute, should for reasons satisfactory to themselves determine to quit working they would have a perfect right to do so. There is nothing in the statutes which we call the antitrust laws or in this statute that would justify any interference with the exercise of that right. It may be that this section, Mr. President, is an improvement upon the present statutes in that it emphasizes and legalizes, if further emphasis is necessary, the right of the individual and the right of the organization to quit work and to abstain from working as long as desired and not be subject to any of the provisions of the antitrust law.

Therefore with reference to this branch of the subject I may summarize the situation by the statement that section 7 makes so far as the antitrust laws are concerned all labor and agricultural associations lawful and endows them with power, if they did not have it before, of carrying out in a lawful manner the legitimate purposes and objects of their organization, but they may nevertheless so act as to violate the law just as corporations or individuals may violate it by conduct which brings them within its prohibitions.

No combination really becomes a combination in restraint of trade until it does something, until it takes some active step, until its plans are effected or sought to be effected by overt acts. A man may contemplate a crime, and the law is powerless to lay its hand upon him until by some act he does or attempts the thing forbidden.

So it is the act or the attempted act, in its last analysis, which makes a corporation or any other association of individuals subject to the provisions and the inhibitions of the antitrust law, and it would be a mistake if this bill were enacted into a statute under the mistaken impression that it does something more; otherwise a large class of our fellow citizens might well say that they asked us for bread and received a stone.

A combination of men, like any other combination, can become, through their actions, a conspiracy in restraint of trade. We may imagine a half dozen merchants doing business individually in the city of New York combining with half a dozen merchants doing business individually in the city of San Francisco to carry out some line of policy as thoroughly prohibited by the antitrust acts as we can imagine similar conduct between as many corporations similarly located. We may also imagine a combination in restraint of trade between organizations of men who are unincorporated in the city of Philadelphia and organizations of men who are unincorporated in the city of New Orleans quite as easily as we can imagine it between corporations existing in those two places. The difference is not in organization, not in the components which make up those committing the offense, but in the offense itself. It seems to me, therefore, that he who defines this proposed statute as one giving full immunity to organizations whereby they will be entirely exempted from the operative provisions of existing statutes either has not given this section the careful consideration it deserves or else is able to give it a construction to which I can not assent.

Mr. President, I have said that under this proposed statute there can be, in my judgment, no question about the right of organizations to strike, to abstain from working if they see fit to do so, but there may be a vast difference between a strike and what is called a boycott. One consists in the exercise of undoubted constitutional right; the other consists in the exercise of a power which may or may not conflict with the guaranteed rights of other individuals, which may or may not come within the prohibitions of existing statutes. If it does not, there is no penalty; if it does, then the penalty should be as inevitable, and I think is as inevitable, in the one case as in the other.

Mr. President, a boycott, as I have said, may or may not be an act in restraint of trade, but it is difficult to conceive of an effectual boycott that is not in restraint of trade to a greater or less degree. It is true that a boycott may be practiced upon the individual without reference to the thing or commodity involved. It is equally true that you can seldom separate the one from the other. As a consequence, unless section 18—about which I will perhaps have something to say when we reach it—makes a change which I am unable at present to perceive, this bill, if enacted, will not relieve any organization from the consequences of the antitrust acts if, in carrying out what is known generally as the boycott, there is involved a restraint of trade under the meaning of the antitrust laws.

Mr. President, let me instance one or two forms which the boycott has taken to which public attention has been directed and which to my mind, irrespective of this proposed statute, will bring those who repeat the same practice directly within the antitrust acts. I read from the World's Work of July of this year, at page 257, the following:

THE UNIONS AND THE SHERMAN ACT.

Some time ago a department store in one of our large cities bought some goods from a manufacturer who was at odds with the local union. A walking delegate went to the manager of the store and told him not to buy from that manufacturer. The store manager replied that he was not concerned in the union's fight and that, as he could serve his public best by buying from the nonunion manufacturer, he would continue to do so.

The next day a woman came into the store and ordered a large ice chest to be delivered C. O. D. on the top floor of an apartment that had no elevator, 4 or 5 miles from the store. When the ice box was finally in place the woman told the delivery men from the store that she did not want it because she had learned that the store dealt with manufacturers who were "unfair" to labor. The next day a similar thing happened, and again the day after. Such annoyance finally became so common that the manager of the store notified the offending manufacturer that he would no longer deal with him. Then all went well again, except that the public got a poorer article made in a union shop for the price it used to pay for the better article.

In a certain small town the school authorities had decided upon a set of readers for the schools, their judgment being based entirely upon the educational merits of the books and upon the price. When the purchase was about to be made, some of the members of the town council who were members of unions were told that these books were not made entirely in a union shop. The members of the council (the body that pays the school bills) suggested that another set of books, the product of entirely union shops, be substituted. The school authorities made the change and all went well—except that the children of the town were taught from inferior books.

A company that employs nonunion men in the manufacture of building materials sold a large part of its product in a large city near its plant. The unions of the building trades refused to allow their members to work on buildings where the materials came from this company. The unions were very strong and the company was driven out of that field; in other words, competition was reduced by the elimination of one competitor.

Mr. President, these acts are essentially acts in restraint of trade. They necessarily affect commodities which but for them would take their chance in the competitive market and succeed or fail upon their own merits. If they are entirely shut out, as was the case here, there necessarily is an injury to trade, and that injury comes from combined action. You may call it what you will, but the effect upon trade is the same. There is nothing in this bill, and there is nothing that we could constitutionally put into this bill, that would so far legalize such acts as to exempt those committing them from responsibility under the general statutes of the Nation.

In this connection I call attention, Mr. President, to an article written by one Walter Gordon Merritt, a gentleman whom I do not know, with whose views I am not in full accord, but who makes some observations upon the subject which I am now discussing that seem to me to be entirely pertinent. He says:

Labor unions occupy a new relation to the law of to-day, not on account of a change in the law but on account of a change in their activities and of their assertion of an interest in the sale and distribution of commodities which are the subject of commerce. The adoption of the union label and the statutory regulations in connection therewith, which create a new right unknown to the common law, show the tendency of organized labor to follow the products of their labor into commerce by booming the sale of union-made goods and suppressing the sale of nonunion goods.

We may concede, Mr. President, that labor is not a commodity, and, not being a commodity, should not be made subject to the provisions of the antitrust law; but when labor unites its element, whatever it may be called, commodity or otherwise, with the things which it produces and goes into the market for the purpose of promoting or preventing its sale, then we must consider it in connection with the commodities to which such action relates; and inasmuch as it asserts its interest in the thing which it creates and uses its tremendous power in influencing markets for and against it, necessarily it occupies a different attitude from that which it occupies in the mere matter of working or of refusing to work.

This illustrates the fundamental difference between the strike and the boycott; the one concerning labor, the other concerning labor and its product; and in so far as its products are identified with the act, just in so far will there be collision with the provisions of the antitrust act.

We passed a bill here the other day in which we declared that unfair competition is made unlawful. We did not say that unfair competition of corporations shall be made unlawful; that unfair competition of attorneys at law shall be made unlawful; that unfair competition by any particular class of artificial or natural persons shall be made unlawful; but that unfair competition, wherever and by whomsoever practiced, is made unlawful; and when the element of the boycott enters between competitors by taking sides with one and against the other, unfair competition is just as certain to result as that the law of gravitation operates at all times.

All boycotts are direct attempts to control the relation between producer and consumer, while most strikes are the direct attempts to control the relation between employer and employee. The ordinary strike attacks the working organization, or the productive machinery; the boycott attacks trade and good will, or the distributing machinery. The first affects manufacturing, with which the antitrust act has no concern; the second affects the sale and distribution of commodities through commerce, to which the law does apply. The well-organized efforts of unions to drive open-shop articles from interstate commerce clearly offends the Sherman antitrust law, and the same is true of any effort to destroy or suppress the competition of any nonunion manufacturer.

This statement, Mr. President, will remain unchallenged until the Sherman law is modified or repealed.

Let no man, either in this body or out of it, lay the "flattering unction" to his soul that the enactment of this proposed statute is going to exempt organizations from the consequences of such a boycott. There is nothing in this bill, and I repeat that I do not think that constitutionally we could put anything into this bill, that would give it such effect, and he is deceived and will be sadly disappointed who places any other construction upon this proposed law. This author continues:

When workingmen pass from the strike to the boycott they play the rôle of producers of merchandise, interested, like their employers, in the sale and distribution of products which are the joint fruits of capital and labor. The employer seeks to advance the sale of his products in preference to those of his competitors, and the union seeks to advance the sale of products made by union men in preference to those made by nonunion men. Like the employer, the union at times resorts to the illegal practice of suppressing competitive sales. In such cases both employ the same means for the same end, for both block the channels of interstate commerce in order to fill their own pocketbooks.

I do not see, Mr. President, how any man for a moment can question the mathematical accuracy of that statement. It is made dispassionately, and, of course, all discussions of so very important a subject as this should be made without any passion or prejudice, for, Mr. President, legislation conceived and enacted in either generally acts like a boomerang—it recoils upon those for whose benefit it is supposed to have been enacted.

The derailment of a train for the purpose of preventing the transportation of competitive products would be the clearest violation of the antitrust law. In such a case no one would doubt that an employee would be equally guilty with the employer in committing such a crime, yet the blocking of the channels of interstate distribution by intangible methods is open to the same argument.

Mr. President, if it be true that under the provisions of this bill labor organizations may indulge with impunity in the boycott, then it is equally true that manufacturers may combine with labor organizations in boycotting their competitors' goods, and because of such combination they will also become exempt from its operations, for it is an elementary legal proposition permitting of no exception that if the principal is not guilty the accessory can not be guilty. The result would be that we would have a statute prohibiting corporations from any act in restraint of trade unless those actions were in combination with employees, in which event they would be absolutely exempt from its provisions and the Sherman Act would cease to be an effective force in interstate commerce. The mere statement of such a proposition is its own refutation.

We all know that in many instances such combinations are made; that unscrupulous concerns and manufacturers deliberately unite with labor organizations for the purpose of preventing that competition which if it existed would be helpful for the public, but at the same time result in reduced profits to those interested. I can give one or two instances:

The Manufacturing Woodworkers' Association of New York, composed of union manufacturers of wood trim, agree to employ only union carpenters on condition that the union will protect them from all open-shop competition by calling strikes on all buildings where open-shop products are used. Through this combination no non-union woodwork—which is 25 to 50 per cent cheaper than union woodwork—can be used for building purposes in certain parts of the country, because the builder is deterred from purchasing such material by fear of disastrous strikes. Monopoly and inflated prices are thus assured, while employer and employee divide the spoils.

I am told, Mr. President, that one result of this agreement between the manufacturing woodworkers in the city of New York and the union organizations of that city is that it has completely excluded all nonunion wood-trim products from that market, in consequence of which the others have an absolute monopoly and fix their own prices. I am not arguing for its justice or its injustice; I am simply calling attention to the far-reaching fact that when you concede the exemption of any association from the operation of the prohibitions of the antitrust act, you open a door which will permit of its absolute violation with impunity all along the line. Having conceded such an exemption, I can not conceive of a product of commerce, I can not conceive of a business in which men engage which by combination between corporations and unorganized associations can not snap its fingers in the face of the antitrust act and march forward to monopoly without regard to the power and dignity of the Government.

Mr. President, it has been said—I do not know whether it is true or not—that the strikes in West Virginia were largely financed by coal operators in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and western Pennsylvania in order to overcome the natural advantage which the West Virginia mine owner had because of the quality of his coal, the manner in which nature has placed it in the earth, and the advantage of other conditions which are commercial in their character. Whether it be true or not, the possibility of the accomplishment of such a thing is certainly obvious to anyone, and therefore I repeat that if under the provisions of this bill a boycott aimed at the distribution of products is legalized, then the producers of certain lines of those products, by combining with those carrying on the boycott, can effectuate their own monopoly in defiance of the prohibitions of existing law. I do not think, Mr. President, there is any part of the country or any citizenship in any part of the country in or outside of labor organizations that would seek or attempt to justify or expect the enactment of legislation having that effect.

There is another thing, Mr. President, with reference to this bill to which I want to call attention. I must repeat that my main purpose is to inform those interested in the measure that this bill is not the all-embracing panacea which some seem to think, to the end that there may be no flareback as against this Congress after its provisions are tested by the courts. This bill does not, because it can not, interfere with the operations of any State law bearing upon the subject of labor organizations, of corporate monopoly, or any other commercial legislation. It may be, Mr. President, that our steady and constant advance toward centralization, our usurpation, if I may use the word, first of one and then of another hitherto recognized State right, will ultimately bring all these things under the shadow of the National Capitol. It may be that even I shall live to see the States relegated to the position which counties in the States now occupy and the National Government extend its arms, like those of Briareus, until they shall take in and embrace every subject of local concern.

Of course, this bill does not pretend to interfere with the operation of State laws; but, Mr. President, we should make the statement here, so that we can not be misunderstood hereafter, that every repressive statute now upon the statute books of every State will be just as effective, just as operative, and just as vigorous as it is at present. The legislation which we are enacting, within the provisions and pledges of the Democratic platform, means what the language employed conveys to the mind, and will be so construed.

I have heard it said, though not in any authoritative way, Mr. President, that this bill is desirable because of the complaints which have been made concerning the unjust nature of State legislation. I have heard it confidently asserted that as soon as this bill is enacted into law every statute in conflict with it, wherever existing, disappears to the extent of such conflict. That is an impression which ought not to be entertained anywhere, and which I think justifies calling attention to the fact, however obvious its unfounded character may be to Members of this body.

The amendments proposed by the Senate committee, Mr. President, are, in my mind, admirable, in view of the purposes sought to be subserved; and, as it stands, the bill ought to become a part of the statutes, since it meets the legitimate objections which have been made to the provisions of the Sherman law, based and founded, as those objections are, upon criticisms and comments made by the framers of that measure at and before the time of its enactment.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments. I wish to express my approval of section 7 of the bill. I do not think that the framers of the antitrust law, the so-called Sherman Act, had any intention whatever originally of preventing the organizations of labor being formed for the protection of laboring men. The purpose of the original act was to lay a restraining hand upon the power over the people of monopolies, of the great concentrations of wealth that controlled the market place, and by virtue of their organized power were able to impose upon the great masses of the people.

It was not the purpose to deal with the then existing petty organizations of labor, because, for the most part, they are only small organizations, labor unions, of little groups in towns, composed of carpenters, plumbers, plasterers, tinners, bakers, and so forth, and men engaged in various other lines of industry, who by means of organization try to protect themselves so as to get a little better wage for their labor. Since labor is in a position where great organizations of capital can pit labor against labor and unorganized labor against organized labor, it is the general consensus of the opinion of the people of the United States, I am sure, that these labor and agricultural organizations ought not to be embraced within the prohibitions drawn against gigantic organizations of capital, which can exercise wholesale monopoly over every line of commerce. I therefore wish to give my approval to section 7, but I do not care to repeat the arguments which have been made a number of times in explanation and justification of this section.

It has seemed to me that the word "consumers," however, ought not to be stricken out, because one of the processes now going on in American life is that of consumers in cities trying to get together in small organizations with a view of protecting themselves against monopoly in local markets, just as is being done in this city (Washington, D. C.) now. I shall not enlarge upon it; I do not think it is very important, because I do not think under any circumstances, whether or not this word were stricken out, that the officers of the Government would undertake to apply the antitrust laws to the small groups of people who might unite together for mutual self-help against monopoly in local markets.

There is another matter, Mr. President, which I desire to mention and which the liberty of debate permitted under the rules of the Senate will allow me to discuss, but I shall only take a few minutes, and I hope that I shall have the tolerance of the Senate while I make a few remarks upon it.

The assaults being made upon the initiative and referendum throughout the Nation merit the careful attention of every American citizen who believes in popular government and genuine majority rule.

Direct legislation is now in operation in 15 States, and its adoption is a vital issue in many others. Its advance is, of course, bitterly opposed by the special interests. But not content with combating the further extension of the initiative and referendum, various corrupting corporations and the corrupt political machines under their influence or control are determined to destroy these instruments of self-government in States which have already secured them.

In Missouri, for example, the legislature has submitted, in place of the excellent provision now in force, a new substitute amendment which will, if adopted, practically kill the initiative and referendum in that State. The people of Missouri are not aware of the true character of the proposal made to them.

They are being asked to support a deceptive substitute, on the grounds that it will prohibit the initiative from being applied to the single tax. As a matter of fact, they are being asked to renounce the sovereign control which they now possess over the lawmaking function, forfeit the powers they gained after years of struggle, and once more place the State legislature in supreme control over themselves.

In Montana the supreme court has recently been asked to invalidate, upon absurd technicalities, an initiative and referendum amendment adopted by the people of that State in 1906.

In Arkansas the supreme court has by unfriendly decisions destroyed a great part of the amendment adopted in 1910.

In Washington the organized farmers and workingmen have found great difficulty, under the unjust and arbitrary conditions imposed by the legislature, in securing petitions for laws desired by them. Even after petitions have been secured, the State officials are seemingly making every effort to keep these questions off the ballot—questions which the special interests do not want submitted to the people.

In Oregon an attempt is being made to secure the passage of a law which will render it almost impossible to secure petitions. In Colorado Gov. Ammons has declared himself in favor of inhibitive restrictions. Like attacks might be mentioned in other States.

Mr. President, the cause of this sinister warfare against the people's new-found liberties is not far to seek. Many laws of the highest importance to equalize opportunity, to conserve, protect, and develop human life and human energy are urgently needed. Those great objects are to be accomplished by a series of measures involving social and industrial reforms. There is in reality a political struggle being waged between the masses of the people and the organized forces of human selfishness, which have systematically glorified the acquisition of property at the expense of human life and happiness.

It is the failure of representative government to give the people what they want that has caused the people of several States to demand and secure the initiative and referendum. A demand for direct legislation is being made by the people of every State. This movement the forces of reaction are determined to overthrow, if not openly, then by betrayal. This is the explanation of all these amazing attempts to prevent true self-government from being established in this Republic, founded upon the principle of the sovereignty of the people. This is why men who claim to reverence Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln bend their energies to subvert and annihilate methods of government which embody the very essence of every principle for which those great exponents of government by the people stood. I deem it a public duty to expose upon the floor of the Senate this attack upon popular government, and I desire to insert as a part of my remarks a statement upon this subject prepared by the National Popular Government League, of this city, which sets forth in detail the methods now being employed to destroy the initiative and referendum and block the efforts of the American people to attain true political liberty.

If there is no objection, I should like to insert that in my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PITTMAN in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE NATION-WIDE ATTEMPT TO DESTROY THE EFFICIENCY OF THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM.

A statement prepared by Judson King, executive secretary of the National Popular Government League, and individually reviewed, accepted, and approved by the following officers of the league:

U'Ren, San Francisco, attorney at law; Delos F. Wilcox, Ph. D., New York, consulting franchise expert, author "Government by all the People."

The warfare of the reactionary allied corporation and political interests to prevent the successful establishment of constitutional amendments and statute laws for the initiative and referendum in American States and cities has been directed along four general lines:

FIRST. TO PREVENT THEIR INTRODUCTION AT ALL.

It took 10 years of strenuous fighting in Oregon to secure direct legislation, 12 years in Missouri, 18 years in Ohio, etc. After 22 years of effort since the popular demand began, only 17 States have amendments, such as they are.

SECOND. TO HAVE THEM DECLARED "UNCONSTITUTIONAL" BY COURTS.

The Morgan interests carried a case to the Supreme Court of the United States in an effort to have the Oregon amendment—and hence all amendments—declared "repugnant to the Federal Constitution." The court decided in 1911 that it was a political question for Congress to determine. And Congress has kept hands off. Attacks of like character have been made in nearly all State supreme courts.

THIRD. TO INDUCE LEGISLATURES TO INSERT "JOKERS" IN PROPOSED AMENDMENTS WHICH WOULD RENDER THEM UNWORKABLE WHEN SECURED.

Of the 17 amendments adopted, only 8 can be called good. And there are only 4 honest, adequate, complete systems in operation to-day. The rest are all defective at vital points, and some are absolutely worthless. Six proposed amendments will be voted on November 3, 1914. Four of these are worthless.

FOURTH. TO BREAK THEM DOWN AFTER THEY ARE ESTABLISHED.

An account of attacks of this character is the subject of this writing. In nearly every State which has direct legislation the interests are constantly at work to destroy them or prevent their use on vital issues. The courts are appealed to, the legislatures are seduced, and even the people themselves are asked—not to repeal the initiative and referendum, the interests are too clever for that,' but to vote for innocent-looking changes in the amendments which will deprive the people of practical power to control the lawmaking function of their government.

It is these "jokers" which shear the voters of their power and against them all champions of government by the people should be on their guard. An abortive initiative and referendum is worse than none at all.

MISSOURI.

One of the cleverest attempts to deprive the people of a great State of the powers they now possess under the initiative and referendum is furnished just now by Missouri.

In 1912 an amendment to the State constitution proposing a mild application of the principle of the single tax was placed upon the ballot by initiative petition, and, after one of the most bitter and sensational campaigns of its kind ever known in the State, was defeated by a vote of 508,137 against to 86,647 for. The total vote for governor was 699,210; hence 85.1 per cent voted on the proposition. So great was the opposition to the measure that a very considerable demand was made upon the legislature to make it impossible for the single tax to be again initiated. That was all. There was no demand from the people that the use of the initiative and referendum on other questions be impaired or prohibited.

The legislature of 1913 submitted an entire substitute initiative and referendum section to be voted upon at the general election, November 3, 1914, which contains a clause prohibiting the initiative and referendum from being applied to the single tax; but it did not stop with this.

Several other new provisions were inserted which, if adopted, will render it easy to stop the use of the initiative and referendum on any subject whatever which may meet with any powerful opposition.

THE OPEN RESTRICTION.

What might be called the antisingle-tax section is as follows:

The powers reserved or contained in this section as aforesaid shall not be used to pass a law or constitutional amendment authorizing any classification of property for the purpose of levying the different rates of taxation thereon, or of authorizing the levy of any single tax on land or land values or land sites at a higher rate or by a different rule than is or may be applied to improvements thereon, or to personal property, or to authorize or confer local option or other local powers in matters of taxation in or upon any of the counties, municipalities, or political subdivisions of the State, or to repeal, amend, or modify these provisions relating to taxation.

This is a remarkable proposition.

Not only are the single-taxers tied up tight, but everyone else, no matter how hostile to the single tax. The principle of property classification is not the single tax, but is urged by bitter antisingle-taxers. The principle of home rule in taxation is not the single tax. Even the Supreme Court of the United States, which can not be said even to have single-tax leanings, declared (Pacific Express Co. v. Seibert, 142 U. S. Repts., 351):

A system which imposes the same tax upon every species of property, irrespective of its nature or condition or class, will be destructive of the principle of uniformity and equality in taxation, and of a just adaptability.

PEOPLE POWERLESS TO CHANGE THIS.

The people are thus asked to surrender any practical control over the function of taxation; but, what is more, they are specifically cut off from ever recovering control if they so desire. They can not use the initiative and referendum to "amend, repeal, or modify these provisions relating to taxation." If the old adage be true, that the power to tax be the power to govern, then a more humiliating proposition was never presented to a free citizenship.

OTHER RUINOUS PROVISIONS APPLYING TO ALL PETITIONS.

But this is not the most important thing. Let us examine further. Another new provision, the conditions of which are in another place repeated so as to apply also to the referendum, reads:

Initiative petitions shall be filed with the respective county clerks of the respective counties in which the signers thereof reside and vote not less than four months before the election at which they are to be voted upon. Within 30 days after said petitions are filed with the respective county clerks of the respective counties said initiative petitions shall be by said respective county clerks laid before the county courts of the respective counties, and said petitions shall be examined by the respective county courts of the respective counties, and if the signatures thereto are found to be genuine signatures of voters of such counties, they shall, at least three months before the election at which they are to be voted upon, be certified by the respective county courts of the respective counties to the secretary of state.

This seemingly innocent section when coupled up with another provision, "that petitions must be secured—8 per cent for the initiative and 5 per cent for the referendum—in each of at least two-thirds of the congressional districts in the State," can easily be made an insurmountable obstacle to the use of the initiative and referendum.

WHAT COUNTY CLERKS COULD DO WITH ALL PETITIONS.

Now, watch carefully! All petitions must be in the hands of county clerks four months before the election. That means in 1914, say, on July 3, with the election on November 3. But the clerk may hold these petitions for 30 days before turning them over to the county court. He can hold till August 1 to 3 all petitions filed from July 1 to 3. Now, August 3 is the date on which all petitions must be in the hands of the secretary of state at Jefferson City—that is, "three months before the election"—after being examined and certified by the county courts. It would be a physical impossibility for the county court to do all this for all petitions filed late in June or early in July, and the history of similar petitions filed in States all over the Union shows that a goodly portion of such petitions are filed shortly before or on the final date set. And even if the people should file their petitions earlier, the power of the county clerk to hold them 30 days would still be a menace and could cause thousands of names to fail to reach the secretary of state in time.

The county court could easily refuse to certify a petition to the secretary of state on the grounds that it had not had time to examine the genuineness of the signatures.

It is perfectly clear, then, that any petition opposed by a small number only of county clerks or county courts would have no possible chance to get through, and these officials would all act within their constitutional rights and could not be touched.

UNPRECEDENTED POWER OVER PETITIONS GIVEN THE COURTS.

But more dangerous still is the unprecedented power given the courts to reject at will not only single-tax petitions but all other petitions of the people. The text says petitions shall be certified by the county courts "if the signatures thereto shall be found to be genuine signatures of voters of such counties." This is the first instance where it has been provided not only that genuine signatures must first actually be obtained, but that they are then of no avail until proved genuine signatures of voters before a judicial officer—the first time signatures authorized to be procured by law are presumed to be false until found genuine by the courts.

That this provision would absolutely kill every petition passed upon by an unfriendly court can not be denied. The language is plain; the effect is clear. The examination by the court and the passing upon the signatures by the court, and its finding them to be genuine, is one of the prerequisite steps of a valid petition. Further, the amendment could not be aided by judicial construction because it is a fundamental condition on which a law can be initiated or referred.

In other States, and in Missouri now, the oath of the one securing the petitions that they are genuine signatures of voters is sufficient to establish validity, and such petitions are presumed genuine unless they are proven to be otherwise.

But in this provision the little word "if" shifts the burden of proof to the other side. It is not too much to say that a judge desiring to strictly comply with the requirements laid down could compel, or would have to compel, every man signing a petition to come into court and prove to the satisfaction of the court both that his signature was genuine and that he was a legal voter of the county. Unquestionably, an intolerable burden is here placed upon the judges which is undesirable to them, and one which it is inexpedient and unwise to place upon them.

This provision, if carried out, could and would cause the rejection of all petitions, because it is practically impossible for a judge to examine into the genuineness of all the signatures of his county. If the judge were friendly to the initiated measure he might assume to pass upon the signatures without an examination, but if unfriendly he would simply say, "I am unable to find the signatures 'genuine signatures of voters of such counties,'" and what then? There is no method prescribed for reviewing the judge's conduct. It being a judicial act, the judge can not be compelled, by mandamus or otherwise, to find the signatures "genuine signatures of voters of such counties." Had this section been simply an effort to have questionable signatures passed upon it would have provided that within the 30 days anyone could present to the court evidence of the falsity of signatures questioned, and then the court would have to pass upon only the questioned signatures instead of the unquestioned ones as well. If the court had to pass only upon the genuineness of the signatures, he might take the testimony of those of actual voters of his county. Think of a county judge examining into the fact as to whether every signer of a petition is a voter.

If the courts, acting clearly within the powers thus granted, could easily throw out petitions which were genuine, consider with how much greater ease they could decline to certify a petition on which a few illegal or doubtful names appeared. It is always a simple matter for those opposing a petition to "job" a solicitor, no matter how honest he may be, and get fraudulent names upon a petition. Judges could hold the whole petition incompetent because of a few bad signatures, no matter how genuine all the rest of the petition might be. The whole provision is comparable only to one which might prescribe that no man's vote upon a measure could be counted until first passed upon by the courts.

ESPECIALLY HARD FOR THE FARMERS.

The farmers have made active use of the initiative and referendum in nearly every one of the 15 States where it is in operation. They will want to do so in Missouri. The above provisions will make it harder for them to secure valid petitions even than for town people. For example, the organized farmers of the State of Washington this year initiated seven laws of tremendous value to them, which were rejected by the legislature. They appointed a joint legislative committee to manage the work of securing the seven petitions, and found it a difficult matter. Think of the additional money, anxiety, and trouble it would cost the committee, under the proposed Missouri conditions, to watch all the county clerks and the county courts to see if they were properly attending to petitions after they had been filed! The farmers would be helpless against hostile county courthouse "rings," and the rings be protected by the constitution itself. And, then, if they were blocked in just 1 district out of the necessary 11, the whole State petition would fail, even if all the voters in the other 10 districts had signed the petition.

TIES UP THE PEOPLE FOR SIX YEARS.

It is also provided that any law or amendment to the State constitution rejected by a vote of the people can not be resubmitted by petition for a period of five years. This means six years, since Missouri has biennial elections. The provision reads:

When any measure shall have been submitted to the people for their approval under the powers reserved or contained in this section, as aforesaid, and shall be rejected by the people, neither the same measure nor any other measure which shall have or tend to have the same meaning, nor any other measure which shall have or tend to have the same or similar effect as the measure rejected, shall again be submitted under the said powers reserved or contained in this section for a term of five years.

On first blush this is ostensibly inserted to prevent the early resubmission of a defeated initiative measure. A law or constitutional amendment rejected in 1914 could not be again presented till 1920, then 1926, and so forth, nor could anything which a court might say "tended in that direction" be submitted. An emergency might arise, conditions might change, delay might mean millions of dollars lost; the people might desire to act in 1916 or 1918, but they could not until 1920.

INCLUDES THE REFERENDUM ALSO.

But this provision goes far deeper. It is so worded as to apply to the referendum as well as the initiative. The phrase "powers reserved or contained in this section" includes the referendum.

An amazing limitation on the people is here disclosed which can best be set forth by an example. Suppose the legislature should enact an unpopular law—make some huge appropriation, create some special privilege, give away a railway franchise, or do anything which might be strongly opposed by the people; suppose a referendum petition is filed and the act is rejected by an enormous majority; the very next session of the legislature could enact that exact law—or one like it—and the people could not vote on the question for six years.

A CONFISCATION OF THE PEOPLE'S POWER.

TO SUM UP, WHAT THE PEOPLE OF MISSOURI WHO VOTE FOR THIS AMENDMENT THINK THEY ARE DOING IS TO PREVENT ANOTHER SUBMISSION OF THE SINGLE TAX.

WHAT THEY REALLY WILL BE DOING IS:

1. TO PLACE IN THE HANDS OF A FEW COUNTY OFFICIALS POWER TO PREVENT THE PEOPLE'S USE OF THE INITIATIVE AND REFERENDUM ON ANY SUBJECT.

2. TO SURRENDER THEIR PRESENT CONTROL OF THE TAXATION MACHINERY OF THE STATE AND HAND IT OVER TO THE LEGISLATURE.

3. TO FIX THIS LEGISLATIVE CONTROL IN THE CONSTITUTION IRREVOCABLY SO THAT THE PEOPLE CAN NEVER CHANGE OR RECOVER IT.

4. TO DENY TO ALL THE PEOPLE FOR SIX YEARS THE USE OF EITHER THE INITIATIVE OR REFERENDUM ON THE SUBJECT MATTER OF ANY MEASURE ONCE REJECTED BY POPULAR VOTE.

5. TO GIVE THE LEGISLATURE ABSOLUTE POWER TO IMMEDIATELY REENACT ITS OWN LAWS WHICH THE PEOPLE HAVE REJECTED THROUGH THE REFERENDUM.

When closely examined, therefore, and its "sleepers" pointed out, the people of Missouri are asked in this substitute to vote to curtail and destroy their own legislative powers and to solemnly announce by their votes that they can not trust themselves with the instruments of self-government, which they now possess, but must return to the old conditions of being controlled instead of remaining their own masters as at present. If this substitute carries, it will be the first time in American history when the people by their own act have deliberately deprived themselves of popular sovereignty.

It is unthinkable that a majority of the members of the Missouri Legislature who voted for this substitute were correctly informed as to the true significance of the changes proposed, as there are many members who are strong supporters of direct legislation.

WHO IS BACK OF THIS SCHEME?

The whole situation is a pleasing prospect indeed—to the reactionary interest. The railroads, the brewery interests, the franchise grabbers, the wealthy tax dodgers, and, in short, all forms of "special privilege" opposed to the people and who hate the initiative and referendum with an undying hatred, have now their golden opportunity. They know exactly what they are about. Taking advantage of the resentment aroused by the submission of the unpopular single-tax proposal they hope to carry this new substitute amendment and so "hamstring" the initiative and referendum itself. If the people of Missouri fall in with this scheme, they will find their hands completely tied on any practical use of the initiative and referendum in the future.

The great mass of the voters do not know this. In truth, proposed measures are so inadequately published in Missouri that not more than one-third of the voters will ever see the text of this substitute.

Every citizen of Missouri who believes in democracy and the rule of the people should awake to the fact that the passage of this amendment would destroy his fundamental political rights, won after years of struggle. It would place Missouri in the column of reactionary States.

Talk about the danger of the single tax is without point. The people of Missouri did not want it and voted it down almost unanimously. It is absurd, therefore, to ask this same people to indorse a proposition which implies that they are unfit for self-government and unable to use the initiative and referendum.

Hence, the question before the people of Missouri is not whether they want to vote on the single tax, but whether they want to retain the power to vote upon anything.

Here is what some leading public men in Missouri and elsewhere think about the value of the initiative and referendum:

GOV. ELLIOTT W. MAJOR.

Gov. Elliott W. Major, when he was attorney general of Missouri, filed a brief for the initiative and referendum before the United States Supreme Court, in which he argues strongly against the attempt to declare these measures unconstitutional, and he said that they were the distinguishing right of the people under a republican form of government.

GOV. HERBERT S. HADLEY.

In his message to the Forty-ninth General Assembly of Missouri, Gov. Hadley said:

I believe that, on the whole, the initiative and referendum in our constitution has been beneficial. Some persons have urged that the requirements for initiating laws or amendments to the constitution should be made more difficult. I do not agree with this suggestion and I recommend that the law stand unchanged.

GOV. JOSEPH W. FOLK, NOW ATTORNEY FOR THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

Ex-Gov. Folk, in his address before the National Popular Government League in Washington, D. C., on December 6, 1913, strongly condemned this attempt to kill the initiative and referendum in Missouri:

If the opponents of the initiative and referendum succeed in hobbling it with this proposed amendment in this respect—the next step, of course, will be to hobble it in some other respect, and directly take away from the people the power to vote on some other question. This, together with the other changes made by the new proposal, leads to the practical repeal or abolition of the initiative and referendum. I hope the people of Missouri will not be misled into giving up this power that they now have in their hands and the obtaining of which has taken 14 years of political struggle. If they tie their hands now from voting on something they do not want, they will find themselves powerless in the future to secure something they do want.

We want in this country not only good government, we want self-government. We might have good government under a king; we might have so-called good government, though all of us be slaves. As between good government without self-government and bad government with self-government, I would prefer the latter.

The initiative and referendum are the tools of self-government, and when the people have these in their hands they can make the Government just as good as they wish to make it or just as bad as they suffer it to become. The kind of government this movement for better things demands is that which comes through governing ourselves.

EX-PRESIDENT THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

In his public addresses and in the platform of the Progressive Party, Theodore Roosevelt has repeatedly urged the initiative and referendum as necessary instruments in the hands of the people to maintain self-government.

HON. WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN.

This great Democratic leader has for 18 years been an active advocate for the initiative and referendum. In a letter written July 15, 1914, urging the voters of Mississippi to adopt a pending amendment providing for these powers, he said:

I regard the initiative and referendum the greatest modern improvement in strengthening representative government.

PRESIDENT WOODROW WILSON.

In his book, "The New Freedom," in chapter 10, entitled "The way to resume," the President said:

Back of all reform lies the method of getting it—

And then he pointed out that the initiative and referendum were necessary instruments in the hands of the people to secure these reforms. They are the key that opens the door to our legislative house. He then says:

The initiative is a means of seeing to it that measures which the people want shall be passed when legislatures defy or ignore public opinion. The referendum is a means of seeing to it that the unrepresentative measures which they do not want shall not be placed upon the statute book.

OREGON.

The notable things accomplished by the people of Oregon through the initiative and referendum have been heralded to the Nation. It is not generally known that since their adoption in 1902 the people of Oregon have been engaged in a constant struggle to preserve these legislative powers against repeated attacks by the enemies of popular sovereignty. The struggle is still on.

The first attack was made by the State legislature of 1903 in an attempt to virtually set aside the referendum by declaring the "emergency clause" upon laws the politicians did not wish to go to the people. The then governor, Hon. GEORGE E. CHAMBERLAIN, now United States Senator from Oregon, being a genuine friend of popular government saw the danger and promptly met the issue by sending such bills back with a stinging veto. His messages roused the State, and it is now dangerous for any member to "trifle" with the emergency clause.

In 1906 the State grange initiated a law taxing the telegraph, telephone, and express companies upon their gross incomes. They were at that time practically untaxed. The bill was adopted by the people. The Morgan interests refused to pay the tax, and took this as a test case to the Supreme Court of the United States in an effort to have the Oregon initiative and referendum declared "unconstitutional," and so kill the movement in the entire Nation. They failed, but the struggle was a costly and harrowing one to the people.

At every session of the legislature laws or changes in the amendments are introduced calculated to "pull its teeth." For example, in 1910 the legislature proposed a new constitutional convention. The evident scheme was to fix up a new constitution in which all the new popular-government provisions would be either abolished or rendered inoperative. A hard campaign ensued, and it was rejected by the people.

In 1910 an amendment was submitted to the people to require measures to receive a majority of "all votes cast in the election" to enact measures instead of a majority of the votes cast on the question, as at present. It took a vigorous campaign to defeat this joker.

At the present time a new amendment is proposed which will prohibit the employment of solicitors to secure petitions. Needless to say, this attempt is meeting with the strong opposition of all organizations and men who know from actual experience what it means to get petitions and what a blow this would prove to the successful use of the initiative and referendum, as it has already proven in the State of Washington.

IDAHO AND UTAH.

By a vote of 43,658 to 13,490, the people of Idaho placed in their constitution at the election of 1912 what they supposed was an initiative and referendum amendment. It contained several jokers, but, worst of all, was not made self-executing. It provided that the legislature should draft laws, filling in details and putting it into effect. The legislature of 1913, in defiance of the direct mandate of the people, refused to pass such legislation. This is a repetition of the same fraud which was practiced upon the people of Utah since 1900. The "general principle" was put in the constitution, and for 14 years the people have waited in vain for the legislature to put the initiative and referendum in action. No legislature should be permitted to fix by law the conditions upon which the people may review its acts.

WASHINGTON.

The voters of Washington adopted the initiative and referendum at the general election of 1912. It was a defective amendment. Among other things, it failed to provide for the use of the initiative on amendments to the State constitution. Gov. Hay's opposition to the constitutional initiative defeated him for reelection. The legislature met in January, 1913, and under the guise of "safeguarding" the amendment, deliberately passed an enabling act which needlessly placed severe handicaps upon the people in any use of the initiative and referendum. It is made a "gross misdemeanor" for a busy citizen to aid a petition in which he is interested by hiring a solicitor to secure signatures. Only names of voters who are actually upon the last registration lists can be counted on petitions, and so on.

On July 3, after a heroic struggle, the State Farmers' Grange, the State Farmers' Union, the State Federation of Labor, and the Direct Legislation League, acting under the direction of a joint legislative committee, succeeded in surmounting the obstacles and filed petitions for seven laws—"the seven sisters"—of great importance to the common people but undesired by the politicians and the interests. Miss Lucy R. Case, of Seattle, a most able woman and secretary of the committee, gave her entire time for six months, without pay, to the work of securing this petition. But even then the petition cost $1,281.93. Thirty-one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six names were necessary; 35,000 were secured and properly certified to before the county registers, where they were signed.

The interests opposed to these laws organized a "Stop, Look, Listen League," and spent thousands of dollars in paid newspaper advertising and otherwise in an attempt to frighten the people away from signing petitions. They are now bending every energy in an attempt to prevent the questions from going on the ballot. In this they evidently have the support of the State administration. The law requires the secretary of state simply to count the signatures certified to by the county authorities, and if sufficient he is required to place the questions on the ballot. Instead of this Secretary Howell assumes jurisdiction upon the genuineness of the signatures and is putting the State to a frightful expense to verify work already done. His every move is hostile and the seeming intent is, upon one pretext or another, to throw out enough names to cause the principal petitions to fail.

The attorney general, Mr. Tanner, makes the unheard-of "ruling" that during the 30 days given the secretary of state by law to count the names citizens can withdraw their names; and blanks for that purpose have been prepared in the office of the secretary of state. But no new names can be added. The "Stop, Look, Listen League" is scouring the State to induce men to withdraw their names, and at this writing (July 27) it is doubtful if the farmers' important laws will go on the ballot.

But whatever the outcome, this experience of the people of Washington serves as a warning to other States to watch "enabling acts" closely. It further shows the bitter hostility of reactionary politicians and corporations to permitting the people expressing their will on important laws. Mr. C. B. Kegley, of Palouse, Wash., master of the State Grange, strongly opposes the law prohibiting responsible organizations and citizens from employing solicitors, thus enabling the volunteer work to be supplemented by men who can give their entire attention to securing petitions in a crisis.

ARKANSAS.

In Arkansas the opponents of the initiative, referendum, and recall have met with success in their efforts to devitalize the amendment through the decisions of a supreme court hostile to these instruments of popular government.

The original amendment, adopted in 1910, read:

> The legislative power of this State shall be vested in a general assembly, * * * but the people of each municipality, each county, and of the State reserve to themselves power to propose laws and amendments to the constitution and to enact or reject the same at the polls—

And so forth.

It is perfectly evident that this is a bungling attempt to establish both the local and State-wide initiative and referendum in one short clause, so adored by constitutional lawyers. In fact, the words "of each municipality, of each county, and of the State" were inserted in the original draft as an amendment to accomplish this purpose, and not, as was claimed in the campaign, to permit the cities to override the State constitution.

Nevertheless the supreme court declared itself unable to discover what the language meant, and so abolished the whole clause, which took from the people their constitutional right of initiative and referendum in counties and cities. Exit the local initiative and referendum!

Next, the legislature of 1913 passed a law under the "emergency clause" and thus denied a referendum petition upon it on the grounds that it was "necessary for the immediate preservation of the public peace, health, and safety," but also provided that the law should not go into effect for one year. The supreme court upheld the legality of this action. Hence, exit the referendum!

Next, in 1912 the people passed an amendment by initiative petition establishing the recall on all public officers, including judges. Also two other amendments.

Now, the constitution adopted in 1874 provided that the legislature could submit only three amendments at any one election. The initiative and referendum amendment adopted in 1910—36 years later—did not disturb the old system, but made no limitations on the number of amendments the people might submit by petition.

At the 1912 election the legislature submitted proposed amendments No. 11 and No. 12. The people submitted No. 13, limiting the legislative session to 60 days. No. 14 provided for the recall of all elective officials, including judges; also No. 15.

All three of the initiate amendments were adopted by large majorities. The election board refused to certify the adoption of Nos. 14 and 15, on the grounds that they were illegally submitted.

Suit was brought, and the supreme court solemnly decided that limitation of three, adopted in 1874, governed the amendment of 1910, and that amendments 14 and 15 must fail. This is a complete reversal of the universal rule of construction that the last enactment governs and repeals older enactments in conflict.

But by this means the recall was destroyed. Hereafter the legislature can prevent the submission of any amendment by initiative of the people by filling up the ballot with three amendments of whatever nature. Exit the constitutional initiative!

And at the present time it is given to this supreme court to decide whether the people will have the right to vote at the November election upon a bank-guaranty law and a law establishing a State mining board and insure safety for miners. These laws have been properly initiated and promptly enjoined from going on the ballot by the bankers and mine owners.

OHIO.

Ohio adopted the initiative and referendum in 1912. Gross frauds were practiced by the special interests in 1913 in an attempt to secure referendum petitions upon two statutes. These frauds were widely heralded in the press and were made the basis of a demand by these same special interests for a law prohibiting solicitors for petitions to receive compensation. To secure from 60,000 to 125,000 signatures of legal voters upon petitions, as required in Ohio, is a gigantic task, and few petitions could be secured by volunteer work alone.

The friends of direct legislation in the legislature and outside promptly met the issue, a campaign of education was made, the help of the administration was secured, and a law preventing fraudulent securing of petitions was passed, but not the thing desired by the enemies of popular government.

The citizens of Toledo are engaged in a life and death struggle wi ththe public-utility interests over a street-car franchise worth $25,000,000. These interests are now carrying a case to the supreme court in an attempt to have the municipal initiative and referendum law of the State declared "unconstitutional," and so deprive the people of a vote upon the settlement of this important question.

OKLAHOMA.

One of the most vital provisions of a direct-legislation system is adequate publicity upon pending measures for the information of the voters. Oregon has the best method. A neat State pamphlet containing copies of the measures, with their ballot titles, and also explanatory arguments for and against, furnished by citizens or organizations of citizens, is mailed from the office of the secretary of state direct to the voters 50 days before election. In Oklahoma, however, the legislature has failed to provide for any arguments from citizens, and the system of distribution is fatally defective. It is supposed to be handed to the voters at the primary election by election officials. On any vital measure opposed by the machines this is not done adequately. Probably not more than one-third of the voters ever see the pamphlet. Another vital defect in the Oklahoma system is the requirement that measures, to be adopted, must receive a majority of all votes cast "in said election" instead of "a majority of all votes cast thereon."

PENDING AMENDMENTS.

At the general election November 3, 1914, proposed constitutional amendments for the initiative and referendum will be voted upon in five States, as follows:

Texas: Petitions must be signed by 20 per cent of the voters for both initiative and referendum. This is preposterous. No State should require over 8 per cent, and in no case more than 50,000 signatures for the initiative; nor more than 5 per cent, and in no case more than 30,000 for the referendum. The amendment is not self-executing and all other details must be provided by the legislature. It is the Utah and Idaho trick all over again. The adoption of this subterfuge would kill the movement in Texas for years.

Minnesota: The Minnesota amendment is so full of jokers and restrictions that space does not permit even an attempt at discussion. One provision actually gives the legislature specific power to prohibit the circulation of petitions on any subject it sees fit.

Wisconsin: Submits a conservative but fairly good amendment, which it will be worth while to adopt.

North Dakota: Amendment lacks the constitutional initiative, requires too large petitions, and has a wicked "distributing" clause for petitions. There are other jokers. Not worth adopting.

Maryland votes upon an amendment providing for the referendum only. It is in very good shape. The people, however, are prohibited from referring any liquor law.

Iowa: An amendment was passed in 1913, which, if adopted by the legislature of 1915, will be voted on in 1916. Among the numerous jokers which render it worthless may be mentioned the right given the legislature to fix petitions at anywhere from 12 to 22 per cent for the initiative, and from 10 to 20 per cent for the referendum. Worthless.

This statement is by no means a complete account of the unwarranted and unjustifiable attacks made upon the initiative and referendum in States and cities where they are established. The few examples given illustrate the general tendency and demonstrate beyond question that strenuous efforts are being made to destroy the initiative and referendum in America, and that the most dangerous forms which the opposition takes are, first, to insert stealthy "jokers" in these provisions which unexpectedly operate at critical junctures against the exercise of direct legislative powers by the people; and, second, to break them down in the courts.

One of the most important functions of the National Popular Government League (nonpartisan) is to point out these "jokers" and warn the people against them. The league maintains a bureau of information and its headquarters are at 1017 Munsey Building, Washington, D. C., where accurate information concerning these matters can be had freely upon application to the executive secretary.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, reference having been made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] to the recent effort to invalidate the initiative and referendum amendment to the constitution of the State of Montana on account of irregularities claimed to have existed in the adoption of the amendment, I take pleasure in saying to the Senate that the supreme court of my State recently decided that the objections were not well taken, and affirmed the validity of the amendment.

I embrace this occasion to give to the Senate and the country the operation of the amendment so far as it has been utilized in my State. Perhaps some interest will be exhibited in the character of the legislation which has been adopted and which it is proposed to adopt under its provisions.

Two years ago, under the operation of the amendment, we adopted a primary-election law. Every political party in my State for 10 years has declared in favor of a primary-election law. The members of the legislature, of all political parties, were elected upon pledges to enact such a law, but the legislature never enacted the law. Ordinarily one party would control one branch of the legislature and the other party would control the other branch, and they never were able to agree. We also passed a corrupt-practices act at the same time.

There will be submitted at the ensuing election three important items of legislation—a workmen's compensation law, a law to provide for the consolidation of all the educational institutions of the State, and a law providing for the loaning of the State school fund upon farm-mortgage securities. An effort was made to adopt all three of these measures at the last session of the legislature, but, owing to forces that have long been powerful in the political and legislative activities of our State, none of them received the consideration at the hands of the legislature which, in the judgment of the people, their importance demanded. It is intended now to get a direct vote of the people upon these measures.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish to inquire what the amendment is?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 16, after the word "from," it is proposed to insert the word "lawfully."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, line 18, after the word "organizations," it is proposed to strike out the words "orders, or associations."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the provision now reads:

> Or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies—

And so forth.

I do not quite see how the members thereof, in their individual capacities, could be a combination or conspiracy; and I think, beginning on line 19, the words "when lawfully conducted" should also be inserted. Inasmuch, however, as I propose to offer a substitute for that section, which I will now send to the desk and ask to have read, I shall not undertake to secure the insertion of those words.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I send the amendment to the desk simply for the purpose of having it read.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that the committee amendments only are being now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I simply ask that my amendment shall be read and lie on the table. I will offer it at the proper time as a substitute for section 7.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for section 7, it is proposed to insert:

> That nothing contained in the antitrust laws of the United States shall be construed to forbid the creation, existence, and lawful conduct of labor or other organizations instituted for the purpose of mutual help and not having capital stock or being conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of any such organization from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects and purposes thereof; nor shall such organizations, when lawfully conducted, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that the amendment may be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That action will be taken.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, those who have followed the present discussion will recognize that when section 9b is reached it will be advisable, if not indeed necessary, to endeavor to make its provisions conform to the provisions of section 5 of the trade commission bill so far as concerns the proceedings contemplated by the section before either the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Federal trade commission. It will be understood that it is provided by the bill now being considered that sections 2, 4, 8, and 9 are to be enforced either by the Interstate Commerce Commission or by the Federal trade commission through proceedings substantially similar to those provided for in section 5 of the Federal trade commission bill. In anticipation of that necessity, I shall propose an amendment to the section.

Mr. CULBERSON. For the committee?

Mr. WALSH. For the committee—an amendment to section 9b, which is intended to eliminate the provisions therein respecting hearings before these commissions and proceedings thereon, and providing in substance that the procedure shall be the same as provided in the Federal trade commission bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the committee has a right to perfect its own amendment before it is formally submitted; and that, as I understand, is the purpose of the Senator.

Mr. WALSH. Exactly. I thought I would offer this amendment and have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the request will be granted. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 7 it is proposed to strike out lines 21 to 25, inclusive, and on page 8 to strike out lines 1 to 12, inclusive, in the following words:

> Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid associations of traffic, operating, accounting, or other officers of common carriers for the purpose of conferring among themselves or of making any lawful agreement as to any matter which is subject to the regulating or supervisory jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but all such matters shall continue to be subject to such jurisdiction of the commission, and all such agreements shall be entered and kept of record by the carriers, parties thereto, and shall at all times be open to inspection by the commission, but no such agreement shall go into effect or become operative until the same shall have first been submitted to and approved by, the Interstate Commerce Commission: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as modifying existing laws prohibiting the pooling of earnings or traffic, or existing laws against joint agreements by common carriers to maintain rates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 20, after the words "line of," it is proposed to strike out the word "trade" and insert the word "commerce."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. The Senator from Texas has just stated that the committee amendments are now being considered. I desire to offer a substitute for the matter from line 13, on page 8, to line 4, on page 9. I ask whether the adoption of the committee amendment will interfere with the amendment I shall offer by way of substitution at a later time?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, speaking for myself, I will say readily that it will not have that effect. We are only considering the committee amendments section by section, after which the amendments sought to be proposed by individual Senators may be offered.

Mr. GALLINGER. The whole bill will be open.

Mr. CULBERSON. The whole bill will be open.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true; but I assume that after a committee amendment is adopted, no amendment to that amendment can be offered in Committee of the Whole. That was the point which gave rise to some doubt in my mind; but with the assurance of the Senator from Texas, and unless the Chair indicates otherwise, I shall defer, as I desire to defer, the amendments I have to offer until the committee amendments are disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The opinion of the present occupant of the Chair accords with the opinion stated by the Senator from Texas. It is suggested, however, that the question may be differently ruled on later.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall in the same manner desire to offer a substitute for certain parts of section 9, but, with the understanding just expressed, I shall not offer the amendments at this time.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I rise to inquire whether we are to understand that section 7 has been adopted by the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. CULBERSON. Only the amendments of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that we are simply perfecting the section by the amendments of the committee and that it has not yet come down to the question of the adoption of the bill or the section. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 20, it is proposed to strike out the words "in any section or community."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 3, after the words "line of," it is proposed to strike out the word "trade" and insert the word "commerce."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In the same line it is proposed to strike out the words "in any section or community."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 9 it is proposed to strike out lines 17 to 21, inclusive, in the following words:

> Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing in this paragraph shall make stockholding relations between corporations legal when such relations constitute violations of the antitrust laws.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I wish to state that those words are stricken out on page 9, lines 17 to 21, inclusive, and the proposal is made in lieu thereof on the subsequent page, lines 17 to 21, inclusive. It is a mere transposition and enlargement of the proviso. They ought to be considered together.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to consider the substitute amendment at the same time with the matter stricken out?

Mr. CULBERSON. Oh, not at the same time; but I want the Senate to understand that the proposition is not to strike it out altogether, but to substitute and transpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 23, after the word "any," it is proposed to strike out the words "railroad corporation" and insert "common carrier subject to the laws to regulate commerce."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, line 25, after the words "construction of," it is proposed to strike out the word "branch" and insert the word "branches."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In the same line, after the word "short," it is proposed to strike out the word "line" and insert the word "lines."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just agreed to it is proposed to strike out the word "railroads."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 3, after the word "branch," it is proposed to strike out the word "line" and insert the word "lines."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, line 4, after the word "any," it is proposed to strike out the words "railroad corporation" and insert the words "such common carrier."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, line 6, after the word "line," it is proposed to strike out the word "railroad."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, line 10, after the word "prevent," it is proposed to strike out the words "any railroad company" and insert "such common carrier."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, line 13, after the word "other," it is proposed to strike out the words "railroad company" and insert "such common carrier."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, after line 16, it is proposed to insert:

> Nothing contained in this section shall be held to affect or impair any right heretofore legally acquired: Provided, That nothing herein shall be held or construed to authorize or make lawful anything prohibited and made illegal by the antitrust laws.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I wish to inquire from the chairman of the committee whether the word should not be "or" instead of "and" in that amendment?

Mr. CULBERSON. Where?

Mr. WALSH. So that it would read "to authorize or make lawful anything prohibited or made illegal by the antitrust laws."

Mr. CULBERSON. I have no objection to that change.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me that it might give rise to very serious question as to whether both of those conditions should combine.

Mr. CHILTON. That is right. That change should be made.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask to modify the committee amendment by inserting the word "or" in place of the word "and."

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment on page 10, line 20, after the word "prohibited," it is proposed to strike out the word "and" and to insert the word "or," so that it will read:

> Or make lawful anything prohibited or made illegal by the antitrust laws.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 10 it is proposed to strike out lines 22 to 25, both inclusive, in the following words:

> A violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed a misdemeanor, and shall be punishable by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS obtained the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, before the Senator from Tennessee proceeds, will he allow me to make a formal verbal amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. On page 12, line 4, in place of the word "having," I move to insert the words "shall have."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In the committee amendment on page 12, line 4, after the word "commerce," it is proposed to strike out the word "having" and to insert the words "shall have," so that if amended it will read:

> No common carrier engaged in commerce shall have upon its board of directors, etc.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS. The committee amendment, lines 21 to 25, inclusive, on page 10, being the penal clause of this section, is a matter that will come up on the reconsideration of sections 2 and 4 now pending, and I will ask that that be passed until the motion to reconsider is brought up for determination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state to the Senator from Tennessee that there is no proposition pending to strike out sections 8 and 9, as in the case of sections 2 and 4.

Mr. SHIELDS. No; but the committee strikes out the penal clause. A similar penal clause is to be found in sections 2 and 4, and the motion to reconsider involves those two sections, and involves the question whether the prohibitions contained in 8 and 9 should also be penalized. The questions are analogous. Not only that, but it will save time to dispose of the penal clauses by having them both come up together.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let it be passed over.

Mr. SHIELDS. For that reason I suggest that it be passed over till those are disposed of.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let it be passed temporarily, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendment will be temporarily passed over. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 9 the committee propose to strike out——

Mr. WALSH. Before we proceed to that let me remark to the chairman of the committee that the substitutes should be renumbered. It should not take No. 9 as its number.

Mr. CULBERSON. When we get to the final conclusion of the bill we can renumber the sections.

Mr. WALSH. That will not do, because if we adopt the subsequent provisions you will have incorporated this in section 9. Let me explain it. This amendment proposed by the committee covers acts the violation of which is not intended to be enforced through the trade commission. Penal provisions are attached. A compliance is to be compelled by the peril of incurring the penal provisions. It was not intended by the committee that violations of that part of the section should be considered or have review at all by the trade commission. I suggest that that section should go to section 9b.

Mr. CULBERSON. Will not the Senator be satisfied with postponing the numbering of the sections until we get through with the bill?

Mr. WALSH. It is not a mere matter of numbering, because later on you provide that the whole of section 9 shall be enforced through the trade commission, and you would have to reconsider that provision. It is not a mere matter of renumbering.

Mr. CULBERSON. The remedies in the bill are cumulative and not exclusive.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think it was ever the purpose of the committee to relegate to the trade commission the enforcement of that provision which penalizes transactions between corporations having common directors.

Mr. CULBERSON. I think we can arrange that when we come to consider section 9b. It seems so to me at least.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all of page 11 and the first two lines on page 12 and insert:

After two years from the approval of this act no common carrier engaged in commerce having upon its board of directors or as its president, manager, or purchasing officer or agent any person who is at the same time an officer, director, manager, or general agent of, or who has any direct or indirect interest in, another corporation, firm, partnership, or association, with which latter corporation, firm, partnership, or association or with such person such common carrier shall make purchases of supplies or articles of commerce or have any dealings in securities, railroad supplies, or other articles of commerce, or contracts for construction or maintenance of any kind with any such corporation, firm, partnership, or association to the amount of more than $50,000 in any one year, unless and except such purchases shall be made from or such dealings shall be with the bidder whose bid is the most favorable to such common carrier, to be ascertained by competitive bidding after public notice published in a newspaper or newspapers of general circulation, to be named, and the time, character, and scope of the publication to be prescribed, by rule or otherwise, by the Interstate Commerce Commission. No bid shall be received unless the names and addresses of the officers, directors, and general managers thereof, if it be a corporation, or of the members, if it be a partnership or firm, be given with the bid.

Any person who shall, directly or indirectly, do or attempt to do anything to prevent anyone from bidding or shall do any act to prevent free and fair competition among the bidders or those desiring to bid shall be punished as prescribed in this section.

Every such common carrier having any such transactions or making any such purchases shall within 10 days after making the same file with the Interstate Commerce Commission a full and detailed statement of the transaction, showing the manner and time of the advertisement given for competition, who were the bidders, and the names and addresses of the directors and officers of the corporations and the members of the firm or partnership bidding; and whenever the said commission shall have reason to believe that the law has been violated in and about the said purchases or transactions it shall transmit all papers and documents and its own views or findings regarding the transaction to the Attorney General.

If any common carrier shall violate this section, every director or officer thereof who shall have knowingly voted for or directed the act constituting such violation or who shall have aided or abetted in such violation shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not exceeding $25,000 and confined in jail not exceeding two years, in the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. Upon reflection, we will have the amendment which has just been adopted numbered section 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the paragraph just agreed to will be numbered section 10.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to an amendment to strike out, in lines 19, 20, and 21, on page 12, the words "published in a newspaper or newspapers of general circulation, to be named, and the time, character, and scope of the publication to be," so that it will read:

To be ascertained by competitive bidding after public notice prescribed by rule or otherwise by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

This would leave the entire matter in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I move that amendment to the amendment. The reason for it is that sometimes there are places where they can have only a week, or a notice of that kind, on account of the fact that they have no daily papers, and if it was published in the daily papers in the city it might not reach the people who would want to be reached; and it is best to leave the entire matter of notice to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think it would be better to give them full authority, by rule or otherwise, to make the regulations as to the kind of publication or notice that shall be given. I therefore move to strike out, in lines 19, 20, and 21, the words I have indicated. That would leave the authority with the Interstate Commerce Commission complete.

Mr. CULBERSON. The amendment to the amendment is satisfactory to the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CULBERSON. Commencing at page 14, line 3, it ought to be numbered section 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that part will be numbered section 9.

Mr. CUMMINS. Section 9 would now begin on line 21, page 15.

Mr. CULBERSON. The amendment will begin there, but the section will begin at line 3 on page 14.

That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person shall at the same time be a director or other officer or employee of more than one bank, banking association, or trust company organized or operating under the laws of the United States either of which has deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $2,500,000; and no private banker or person who is a director in any bank or trust company, organized and operating under the laws of a State, having deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $2,500,000, shall be eligible to be a director in any bank or banking association organized or operating under the laws of the United States. The eligibility of a director, officer, or employee under the foregoing provisions shall be determined by the average amount of deposits, capital, surplus, and undivided profits as shown in the official statements of such bank, banking association, or trust company filed as provided by law during the fiscal year next preceding the date set for the annual election of directors, and when a director, officer, or employee has been elected or selected in accordance with the provisions of this act it shall be lawful for him to continue as such for one year thereafter under said election or employment.

No bank, banking association, or trust company organized or operating under the laws of the United States in any city or incorporated town or village of more than 100,000 inhabitants, as shown by the last preceding decennial census of the United States, shall have as a director or other officer or employee any private banker or any director or other officer or employee of any other bank, banking association, or trust company located in the same place: Provided, That nothing in this section shall apply to mutual savings banks not having a capital stock represented by shares: Provided further, That a director or other officer or employee of such bank, banking association, or trust company may be a director or other officer or employee of not more than one other bank or trust company organized under the laws of the United States or any State where the entire capital stock of one is owned by stockholders in the other: And provided further, That nothing contained in this section shall forbid a director of class A of a Federal reserve bank, as defined in the Federal reserve act, from being an officer or director or both an officer and director in one member bank.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 23, after the word "corporations," to strike out "either" and insert "anyone," and, on page 16, line 5, before the word "elimination," to strike out "an" and insert "the," so as to read:

That from and after two years from the date of the approval of this act no person at the same time shall be a director in any two or more corporations, any one of which has capital, surplus, and undivided profits aggregating more than $1,000,000, engaged in whole or in part in commerce, other than common carriers subject to the act to regulate commerce, approved February 4, 1887, if such corporations are or shall have been theretofore, by virtue of their business and location of operation, competitors, so that the elimination of competition by agreement between them would constitute a violation of any of the provisions of any of the antitrust laws. The eligibility of a director under the foregoing provision shall be determined by the aggregate amount of the capital, surplus, and undivided profits, exclusive of dividends declared but not paid to stockholders, at the end of the fiscal year of said corporation next preceding the election of directors, and when a director has been elected in accordance with the provisions of this act it shall be lawful for him to continue as such for one year thereafter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 17, before the word "corporation," to strike out the words "bank or other"; in line 19, before the word "corporation," to strike out the words "bank or other"; and in line 24, before the word "corporation," to strike out the word "bank or other," so as to read:

When any person elected or chosen as a director or officer or selected as an employee of any corporation subject to the provisions of this act is eligible at the time of his election or selection to act for such corporation in such capacity his eligibility to act in such capacity shall not be affected and he shall not become or be deemed amenable to any of the provisions hereof by reason of any change in the affairs of such corporation from whatsoever cause, whether specifically excepted by any of the provisions hereof or not, until the expiration of one year from the date of his election or employment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, to strike out lines 3 to 8, inclusive, in the following words:

That any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $100 a day for each day of the continuance of such violation or by imprisonment for such period as the court may designate, not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHIELDS subsequently said: My attention was called away at the time the amendment in lines 3 to 8, page 17, was read. I ask that it be passed over.

Mr. CULBERSON. Let it be passed over temporarily.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote will be reconsidered and it will be temporarily passed over.

The next amendment was, on page 17, after line 8, to insert:

SEC. 9a. Every president, director, officer, or manager of any firm, association, or corporation engaged in commerce as a common carrier, who embezzles, steals, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, credits, securities, property, or assets of such firm, association, or corporation, or willfully or knowingly converts the same to his own use or to the use of another, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $500 or confined in the penitentiary not less than 1 year nor more than 10 years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Prosecutions hereunder may be in the district court of the United States for the district wherein the offense may have been committed.

Mr. KENYON. If it is in order at this time I should like to offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that it is in order.

Mr. KENYON. On page 17, line 12, section 9a, after the word "misapplies," I move to insert "or intentionally or negligently permits or suffers to be misapplied."

I ask that the Secretary may read the section as it will appear with those words, and I especially ask the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Texas, if he will observe the section as it would be if this amendment be adopted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 9a. Every president, director, officer, or manager of any firm, association, or corporation engaged in commerce as a common carrier, who embezzles, steals, abstracts, or willfully misapplies or intentionally or negligently permits or suffers to be misapplied any of the moneys, funds, credits, securities, property, or assets of such firm, associaton, or corporation, or willfully or knowingly converts the same to his own use or to the use of another, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and upon conviction shall be fined not less than $500 or confined in the penitentiary not less than 1 year nor more than 10 years, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I wish to take just a moment to explain this amendment to the amendment. It seems to me that it ought not to meet any very serious opposition. As section 9a is now drafted the president, directors, officers, and so forth, are made liable if they embezzle, steal, abstract, or willfully misapply. The purpose of my amendment is to reach such a situation as has developed for instance in the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, where a director or an officer pays absolutely no attention to the business of the corporation, goes off to Europe for a couple of years, and in the meantime the funds of the corporation are misapplied. This amendment would hold that director criminally responsible.

I know that at once we are confronted with the legal proposition that you can not make a director responsible where he has nothing to do with the performance, but I do not think that principle can hold where there is a statutory obligation, as this would make upon the director and it would work no hardship, because if he negligently permits the funds to be misapplied, negligently permits the property to be destroyed against the statutory inhibition, he would be guilty of a crime. If the director can not attend to the business of the corporation he should resign. This would give a remedy against the directors who hold the position and pay no attention to the business of the company.

There are many cases, I do not know that it is necessary to cite many of them, showing that the absolute intent to commit a wrong is not essential to make a crime. In cases of manslaughter negligence is so reckless that it is sufficient to make the party responsible therefor.

I have at my desk an English case that I think substantiates the proposition, if there is any serious contention that it is not sound, namely, the case of Rex against Medley, as reported in Sixth Carrington and Payne's Reports. There was an indictment against the chairman, deputy chairman, and others of the directors of the Equitable Gas Co. for polluting a stream. It was shown and it was conceded that these directors knew nothing about the proposition, had nothing to do with it, but under their guidance of the property of this corporation this stream was polluted and this nuisance was thereby committed. The court said:

It is said that the directors were ignorant of what had been done. In my judgment that makes no difference. Provided you think that they gave authority to Leadbeter to conduct the works, they will be answerable.

So in a large number of liquor cases in this country and in cases against gambling on premises the defendants have been held guilty where the gambling has occurred, even though they had told their servants not to permit it, that being a question which would go to the good faith and perhaps inhere in the penalty.

I have here a Maryland case which I will cite. I do not want to take up much time of the Senate upon this proposition, but it does seem to me that a provision of this kind will put additional teeth in this act and will prevent innocent stockholders from being robbed. It is the case of Carroll against The State of Maryland, reported in Sixty-third Maryland Reports, page 551. The appellant was a licensed dealer in spirituous liquors, and was indicted for unlawfully selling liquor to one William Miller, a minor under the age of 21 years. The law under which he was convicted provided that—

If any person shall sell any spirituous or fermented liquors or lager beer to any person who is a minor, under 21 years of age, he shall, on conviction, pay a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $200, together with the costs of prosecution.

There was a violation of that statute by an employee of this man, and it was held there that, notwithstanding the fact that he had told his employee not to sell the liquor, he was personally responsible.

The case of Rex v. Gutch (Moody & Malkin, 433) is cited in Taylor on Evidence. This was a libel case. Lord Tenterden says:

A person who derives profit from and who furnishes the means for carrying on the concern, and entrusts the business to one in whom he confides, may be said to have published himself, and ought to be answerable.

Again, the case of The Queen v. Bishop (L. R., 5 Queen's Bench Division, 259):

The defendant was convicted of receiving into her house two or more lunatics, not being a registered asylum or house duly licensed by law. The jury found specially that the defendant honestly and on reasonable grounds believed that the persons received into her house were not lunatic, though the jury found they were lunatic. The point being reserved, was heard before Coleridge, Denman, Stephen, Pollock, and Field, all of whom affirmed the conviction, holding that such belief was immaterial.

There is one other case in law division, Redgate v. Haynes (L. R., 1 Queen's Bench, 89):

The appellant was charged with suffering gaming to be carried on upon her premises. She had retired for the night, leaving the house in charge of the hall porter, who withdrew his chair to a part of the hotel remote from the guests and did not see the gaming. It was held that the landlady was answerable.

So there is a long line of decisions, and in this country, too, sustaining the proposition. In Martin against the State of Nebraska, found in Thirtieth Nebraska, page 507, it was held that—where intoxicating liquors have been sold on Sunday, the principal, although not personally present, will be liable if his agents or anyone authorized by him to sell or give away intoxicating liquor in his place of business violates the law by selling or giving away such liquors in his place of business on Sunday.

In this case Martin was outside of the State and had no knowledge of the sale whatever.

In Michigan, in the case of People v. Roby (52 Mich 577), it was Held, That under these sections a saloon keeper was properly convicted whose clerk, without his consent or knowledge, but while he was on the premises, had opened the saloon on Sunday morning to have it cleaned out and had meanwhile sold a drink to a casual customer, who insisted on having it.

In a similar case, in State v. Steamboat Co. (13 Md., 181)—

A common carrier was held liable to a statutory penalty for transporting a slave on its steamboat, though the person in charge of its business had no knowledge of the fact.

So the point I am making, briefly stated, is simply this:

Under the section as reported by the committee there is absolutely no criminal liability where a director neglects his duty and the property of the company engaged in interstate commerce is dissipated or misapplied. My amendment simply adds to this statute, which is good as far as it goes, a provision that would make a director or the officers criminally liable where they intentionally or negligently, which would be a question for the jury under the instruction of the court, permit funds to be misapplied. I wish the chairman of the committee could see his way clear to accept the amendment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, without an opportunity to consult with the committee I do not feel authorized to accept the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. CHILTON. This proposed statute was drawn practically from the banking statute as to embezzlement and willfully misapplying funds of the institution. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa would make any director guilty if there were loss to the common carrier which could have been prevented.

Mr. KENYON. Not at all.

Mr. CHILTON. Let us see if it would not.

Mr. KENYON. The word "negligently" is used, and consequently one would have to be negligent in the performance of his duty; but what "negligence" may be would be left in each case to the jury. That is a broad field for a penal statute like this.

Mr. CHILTON. This statute makes it a crime for anyone who embezzles or steals or abstracts or willfully misapplies any of the assets. Then it goes further and makes it a crime if anyone "willfully or knowingly converts the same to his own use or to the use of another."

It was made to cover the class of cases where stockholders do as they did in the New York, New Haven & Hartford road and make trades for twenty or thirty million dollars when it is apparent to everybody that the property was not worth that sum of money, as the evidence shows. It was to cover that kind of a case that this amendment was framed. We did not think we ought to go further in these cases than the wisdom of Congress had seen fit to go in the case of national banks, as to which there is no doubt of the jurisdiction and the power of Congress.

There can be no higher function of a director than that of directing national-bank affairs, and in those matters there is no doubt of the power for Congress to regulate it to the fullest extent. This committee amendment is a little stronger, as I recollect it, than the act governing directors and officers of national banks. It does seem to me that there is no reason why we should go further in the one as to which, in some matters, our power is doubted, than we would in the other, where there is no question of our power.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator believe that a man ought to be permitted to take a place as a director of a great company and loan his name to it and never give one particle of consideration to it—go off on his summer vacation and make yachting trips and let the property in that company be absolutely dissipated, as was done in the New York, New Haven & Hartford case?

Mr. CHILTON. I think the Senator knows me well enough to know how his question would be answered. Of course I do not believe that a director should be permitted to do that.

Mr. KENYON. That is all this amendment does.

Mr. CHILTON. I think not. You say "intentionally or negligently permits or suffers to be misapplied." Why should we not do that in the case of national banks if we go that far as to common carriers?

Mr. KENYON. I think we should. I do not know why directors of national banks——

Mr. CHILTON. Why with railroads when not so with banks? For instance, if a director is away and a jury says he ought not to have been away at the time something happened, I think we would be going a little too far to make that a felony. I have heard of no demand or reason for going that far.

Mr. KENYON. You have not seen any abuse that that would correct?

Mr. CHILTON. None has been brought to my attention.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator must be blind to the industrial condition of this country in the last two years.

Mr CHILTON. I have not known anything of that kind.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator leaves out entirely the word "negligently." If a man went away for a week or two weeks and something happened in the railroad or in the business engaged in interstate commerce of course that would not be negligence unless he had some facts and circumstances to put him on notice that there might be trouble. But if he goes away for years, merely loans his name to the business, and pays absolutely no attention to it, it seems to me he ought to be just as guilty where trouble occurs as if he actually participated in it. But it is a straight issue as to those who believe as the Senator says and those who believe otherwise.

Mr. REED. With the permission of the Senator from West Virginia——

Mr. CHILTON. I yield.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa if he does not think it would be going far enough if an amendment was to be adopted to stop at the word "intentionally" instead of using the word "negligently," so that the amendment would read "or intentionally permits or suffers to be misapplied."

Mr. KENYON. In answer to that, let me ask the Senator this question, which will explain the difference: Does the Senator believe that a director of a corporation engaged in interstate commerce should be permitted to pay no attention at all to the business of that company?

Mr. REED. No; the Senator——

Mr. KENYON. Then, that might not be intentional. That might be a negligent act on his part; and that illustrates the difference.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think the Senator knows that—speaking for myself alone now, and not speaking for the committee; of course, I have no authority to speak for them, and am not presuming to do so—I am willing to go to any reasonable length to stop the practices aimed at by this section. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] suggested the amendment to the House provision. We on the committee who supported it thought that it was a long step in the right direction. It makes the willful misapplication of funds a criminal offense; it makes it a felony; and I think that is very wholesome.

Now, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] suggests an amendment which, it seems to me, has much merit in it; but I am inclined to think it goes too far. I think, in so far as the amendment proposes to insert the words "or intentionally * * * permits or suffers to be misapplied," it is a wholesome provision; I would be inclined to support it; but to make a man guilty of a penitentiary offense for negligently permitting a misapplication might work great hardship.

The Senator asked me a question—whether I did not think it the duty of directors of corporations to attend to their business. I do; of course, we all agree to that. But if the language is adopted which is now in the section, especially if it is amended as the Senator suggests, with the words "or negligently" left out, it is certain we can get every man who has had a criminal intent or purpose in his mind, for somebody must have known what he was doing. But if you make mere negligence a penitentiary offense, it might easily be said that it was the duty of a man to be at a board of directors' meeting; he was not there, and he was negligent; or that if he had investigated clear to the end of a transaction he might have discovered an irregularity, but he failed to do so, and therefore he should go to the penitentiary. It seems to me that that is going a step too far. I think with the words "or negligently" out I could myself heartily support the amendment.

Mr. KENYON. With the permission of the Senator from West Virginia, may I make a suggestion to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHILTON. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. KENYON. The insertion of the words "or negligently" is exactly what I am anxious to accomplish. If those words go out, of course the purpose of the amendment is practically destroyed. To illustrate: Where a man drives his automobile perhaps carelessly and negligently and runs over somebody, the circumstances might be such that he would be guilty of manslaughter; or if he sat in the back seat of his automobile and saw his driver, without raising objection, drive recklessly into a crowd of people and somebody was killed, I think he would be guilty of manslaughter, though such a sentence for that crime would be a hardship on him. The hardship of these directors being compelled to attend to their business, to keep the property of the company from being dissipated, is nothing, however, compared to the hardship of the people who lose when those directors do not attend to their business. I am very frank in saying that my purpose in offering this amendment is to make it impossible for men to hold positions as directors and do absolutely nothing. If they do not want to attend to their business, they have a very speedy and adequate remedy; they can step off the board of directors.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I will not interrupt at this time——

Mr. CHILTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Well, I can say in a word that the way it strikes me is this: There is a very grave difference between a man driving an automobile with such reckless and wanton disregard of the public right along a highway as to kill people and being held for manslaughter and the position of a man upon a directorate. In the first place, no jury would ever convict in the case of the automobile driver if his mind had simply for an instant wandered, unless he had injured somebody when by the exercise of a high degree of care, which he is bound to observe, or, at least, a reasonable degree of care, he could have avoided the injury. The only time that there would be a conviction in such a case would be where a man had been driving at a tremendously reckless rate of speed and had shown a total disregard of the public right, he would have to be guilty of conduct that amounted to wanton and willful negligence as distinguished from a mere lapse of memory or from mere neglect.

If this, the amendment in this instance, were limited to wanton and willful negligence, it would not be so bad; but when you say, Mr. President, that a member of the board of directors shall be sent to the penitentiary if there is a misapplication of any of the funds, even $10 of the funds, simply because he was negligent in not discovering that misapplication or in not preventing that misapplication, it seems to me you are going entirely too far, because we all know that if a director constantly attended every meeting and investigated every item he might discover the facts, and his failure to do so might be said to be negligence for which he might be civilly liable; but surely it would not be right to send a man to the penitentiary because he had been upon a board of directors and there was an item of $10 or some other small sum misappropriated. We must remember that a law of this kind, if put upon the statute books, may be applied to just such a case as that as well as to a director who sits by while $100,000 of fictitious securities are issued. I think in the latter case, where a man is thoroughly put upon his notice, he would have difficulty in escaping; but it seemed to me that if you insert the words "or negligently" you go a little too far; that is all.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has stated so much better than I could have stated the thought that was in my mind that I will not go over what he has said; but I do want to call the attention of the Senate to this difference. Here is a bank whose business is concentrated; it is in one building; the money, the securities, the organization are in one building, and, as I have said, the Congress of the United States has seen fit as to such institutions to use the words "embezzles, abstracts, or willfully misapplies." Those are the words that make the crime under section 5209, the national banking act.

The railroad company may be 100 miles long; it may be 3,000 miles long; it has stations, it has construction works, it has a purchasing department, it has an operating department, it has a clerical department, and a legal department. In contemplation of law every one of those departments is in charge of the directors of the railroad. I am perfectly willing to make any kind of a stringent regulation concerning the operation of a common carrier if it be of such a matter as in the very nature of the organization and the character of the business there will be a fair opportunity for the officer to oversee the transaction as to which you will make his shortcoming a crime. There may be something wrong about the operation of a station out in Montana, but the director in the city of New York or in the city of Baltimore is in contemplation of law and in a way in charge of it; that is, the rules for which he is responsible are the only security that the railroad company, the common carrier, or whatever it may be, may have for the good faith and for the honesty of the employee. I say that, in the very nature of the business, the amendment goes too far.

I think when Congress only went as far as I have stated in regard to the national banks, where the directors and the officers have the whole property and business immediately under their charge, it is going too far for us to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. As the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] says, I am perfectly willing to make criminal a willful and wanton act, but I can not go so far as to say that I think it is proper legislation to merely use generally the words "or negligently" in connection with so serious a crime as we propose to make this. As I have said before, we saw no abuse which justified us in going that far.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, we might very seriously impair the service by the adoption of this amendment. Men would hesitate very much to become directors on such boards if they knew that by mere negligence, by mere oversight, they would subject themselves to imprisonment in the penitentiary.

Then, furthermore, we might punish a man merely for want of mental capacity. An act of negligence is the omission to act as an ordinarily prudent man would have acted under similar circumstances. Persons should not be held criminally liable for doing or not doing what an ordinarily prudent man would do or not do in like circumstances, for such a man might not be an ordinarily prudent man, even though the jury might believe that the defendant did not really comprehend the situation they would have to convict, because they would be instructed by the court to find him guilty if they believed his action was such as an ordinarily prudent man under similar circumstances would not have acted.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] with respect to this subject, and will therefore have to oppose the amendment.

I have an amendment to this section which I should like to submit to the Senate. I think the committee would agree to it if submitted to them. I will therefore suggest to the chairman of the committee the amendment and its effect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WHITE. No, Mr. President; I do not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then, the amendment of the Senator from Iowa must first be disposed of.

Mr. WHITE. I understood that it had been disposed of.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, while, of course, it would not be in order for the Senator from Alabama to offer the amendment pro forma, I think there will be no objection to his stating to the Senate the substance of it, as it might throw light on our action with reference to the adoption or rejection of the pending amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I will submit it, then, for the purpose of being considered hereafter. The amendment is to strike out the word "general" in line 7, page 12, section 9. The provision in the section sought to be amended is to prevent an officer, director, or agent of a selling corporation from acting as a director or other officer of the purchasing corporation.

Mr. CUMMINS. That section has been adopted, Mr. President.

Mr. CULBERSON. That section has already been passed upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The section has been adopted.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest to the Senator that he can offer that amendment when the bill gets into the Senate.

Mr. WHITE. I will state what it is. Of course, I need not insist upon immediate action now, but while I am on the floor I will state the reason for the amendment. I believe a Senator can talk about almost anything while he is occupying the floor.

The purpose of the first provision of section 9, as I have said, is to prevent the president, manager, or director of a purchasing corporation from becoming the officer or agent of some other person or corporation who is selling to the purchasing corporation.

I can see no reason why that prohibition should be confined to a general agent. It should extend to a special agent as well. To illustrate with the words in the provision which my amendment proposes to strike out, a director, manager, or president of a purchasing corporation can become the special agent of a selling concern for the purpose of selling to the particular corporation of which he is an officer. Such an agent would be the most dangerous of all agents. Such agent might be employed for no other purpose than to sell or deal with a particular purchasing corporation of which he is the president or a member of its board of directors, and he may be employed because of his official connection with the purchasing corporation. If that is true, all the harm that is sought to be guarded against will be admitted.

Furthermore, it is very difficult to draw the distinction between general and special agents; the line of demarcation between them is not at all well defined; and I do not see any reason why directors and officers of purchasing corporations should be allowed to act as special agents or agents at all and be prohibited from acting as general agents. I can not quite see the reason for the distinction, and I will ask the chairman of the committee if there is any reason for it?

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not remember, Mr. President, that there is any particular reason for it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am rather inclined to the view of the Senator from Alabama; but we can take that up when we reach it again in the Senate. The section has been adopted as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. OVERMAN. Regular order!

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator does not contend that the provision should apply to station agents, does he?

Mr. WHITE. Of course not; because station agents are not contemplated by the provision. It is intended to affect the agent of some corporation or individual engaged in selling to a railroad or other corporation included in this act. I hope the chairman of the committee will see the propriety of the amendment and consent to its adoption.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa be again stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 12, after the word "misapplies," it is proposed to insert the words "or intentionally or negligently permits or suffers to be misapplied," so that it will read, if amended:

SEC. 9a. Every president, director, officer, or manager of any firm, association, or corporation engaged in commerce as a common carrier who embezzles, steals, abstracts, or willfully misapplies, or intentionally or negligently permits or suffers to be misapplied, any of the moneys, funds, credits, securities—

And so forth.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am in sympathy with the purpose of the amendment, because no one knows better than those of us from the New England States what has happened in reference to a certain corporation; and yet I will venture to ask the Senator from Iowa exactly what interpretation he would put upon the word "negligently"?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, "negligence" is, of course, a well-understood legal term. Negligence is the want of ordinary care under the circumstances. That is a question for a jury to decide, taking all the facts and circumstances into consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is what I was about to ask—if it would necessarily have to be determined by the court.

Mr. KENYON. By the court and the jury.

Mr. GALLINGER. By the court and the jury.

Mr. KENYON. If there were no evidence to justify a verdict of guilty, the court would instruct the jury to that effect, just as if the Senator should sue some one for a personal injury, basing the action on negligence; he would go ahead and show what the facts and circumstances were, and then, although reasonable men might differ as to the matter, it would be a question whether or not under all the circumstances there had been exercised ordinary care, such care as a reasonably prudent man would exercise. I have defined the term as I understand it.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to observe, Mr. President, that, beyond a question, in our national banks and other large corporations there is a great deal of negligence on the part of directors. I think I may say, in reference to national banks, that it is almost a rule that but a small proportion of the men who accept places on the board of directors pay any attention to the business of the bank.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator in that connection. Is it not true that that very neglect has cost the people of this country a good many million dollars?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senator is absolutely correct in making that statement.

Mr. KENYON. Does not the Senator believe that if a man is not willing to perform his duties as a director he ought not to accept the position?

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree with that.

Mr. KENYON. I know the Senator from New Hampshire would not be a director in an institution and pay no attention to its affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER. I certainly would not, Mr. President.

Again, I will say that I am in sympathy with the proposed amendment, and if I felt sure that the courts would reasonably interpret the word "negligently" I should be inclined to support the amendment. Whether or not absence from a certain number of the meetings of a corporation would be negligence I do not know, but if the amendment can be so confined, or if assurance can be given that there will be a reasonable and perhaps rather a liberal interpretation of the word I should be inclined, as I am inclined, to vote for the amendment, because I think we can not very well tie this matter up too closely. Officers and directors of such corporations ought to be held to a strict accountability; there is no doubt about that; and I am satisfied if that had been done in the case of some corporations whose names are fresh in our minds there would have been less looting of their funds than actually occurred.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon a suggestion?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Of course it is impossible to frame any law so that there will not perhaps be some injustice under it, but we have to take into consideration whether the benefits which it will bring will be sufficient to counterbalance the slight evil it may entail. I do not think the Senator would disagree with me when I say that probably no national bank ever failed except for the fact that some man standing high in the community in which the bank was located was negligent in his duty as a director on the board of that bank. The same is true of the unfortunate circumstance in New England to which reference has been made. While it is true, of course, that now and then perhaps a jury might bring in a verdict of guilty in a case where the Senator or myself or others might think the verdict should have been not guilty, the moral effect of this liability would, in my judgment, many times overcome the possible injustice that might here and there occur, and in proportion as the moral effect of this provision were felt and the cases of the kind proposed to be covered were lessened, the less likelihood would there be that juries ever would bring in an unfair or unjust verdict.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the responses which have been made to my interrogatory lead me to conclude to vote for the amendment submitted by the Senator from Iowa, notwithstanding the chairman of the committee thinks that it is not wise. I think that at least it might well go to conference and be considered there, and, if it is agreed to, I should indulge the hope that it would strengthen the legislation to such an extent that the shame that has come to some of us from New England because of certain operations may never be repeated. I will say here, Mr. President, that the disclosures which have been made are a matter of shame to us, and every time the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad is mentioned in this Chamber I feel like blushing in behalf of the people whom I in part represent. The manner in which that property was allowed to become involved was disgraceful, utterly without justification, and almost without parallel in the history of the country.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, before the Senator sits down I will ask him if he does not recognize that the principal part of the wrong that was done in that case was not due alone to negligence, but was due to the making of bad trades, to the use of the money and property of the company in a willfully careless manner?

Mr. GALLINGER. In response to that I will ask, Does the Senator from West Virginia think that if the directors had been diligent and had known what was going on they would have permitted a few men connected with the corporation to have done what they did?

Mr. CHILTON. Probably not. As to some of them, you might say there was negligence, and as to others there was possibly something else. I will not discuss that, because I do not know all of the facts. I only know them generally. The evil would not have been corrected entirely under this proposed statute, although a greater part of it would have been corrected.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to say that, in my opinion, this is a good and wise provision, and that it will save to the people annually much money. Millions upon millions of dollars have been lost to the people through sheer carelessness or negligence upon the part of trustees who have had money in charge. I think more money is lost in that way than is ever actually lost through theft or because of any intentional wrongdoing.

Not only will such a provision save money to the people, but it will be beneficial, at least, to the person in charge of the funds of a corporation, for the reason that it will fix a responsibility upon him; and the disgrace and shame which frequently come to men in such positions because of the loss of money, although they are in no wise directly connected with the loss, will be obviated in the future if they know that there is attached to the positions which they occupy full responsibility for any negligence upon their part and that they will be held answerable.

As I have said, I think that it is a wise provision. I do not believe in unnecessary criminal prosecutions, but if a few examples were made of malefactors it would do wonderful good in this country in clearing up the management of business affairs, and I may say that I think the same principle ought to be applied to public officials. About 40 cents on the dollar, I think, would be saved to the people of this country if we could make such a provision effective as to those occupying official station.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in voting for the amendment of my colleague it ought not to be overlooked that it does not make the negligent officer or director responsible for the small peculations of clerks or ordinary employees. It embraces only the willful misapplication or embezzlement of property by a president, director, officer, or manager of a common carrier, and it seems to me it will very greatly strengthen the paragraph.

I ought to say, and I think candor requires me to say in this connection, that I have very grave doubts with regard to the validity of the paragraph. I seriously question our right to punish larceny from a railroad company unless we couple it with a provision that the larceny in some way impairs the efficiency of the common carrier to render its service to the public.

We are here simply creating the crime of larceny in one form or another. I do not intend, however, to make objection to that phase of it, except that after the amendment of my colleague is voted upon I intend to move to strike out the word "or" in line 17 and insert the word "and."

I am sure the chairman of the committee has not contemplated this possible result of the adoption of the amendment as it is. We declare this offense, which is practically the offense of larceny in one form or another, a felony. Now, the distinctive difference between a felony, as defined by a great many opinions, and a misdemeanor is that the former is punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary and the misdemeanor is not. Now, it is made possible here to imprison the offender in the penitentiary, but it is made possible to permit him to escape with a fine of but $500.

I venture to say you can not find a State in the Union in which the crime of larceny or stealing is punished with a fine and no imprisonment. If this passes as it is, one of the officials of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad Co., having stolen all that the company had, could be indicted in the Federal courts and fined $500, and could not thereafter be punished for that offense under the laws of New York or under the laws of Connecticut, although those laws might require his imprisonment in the penitentiary for a series of years. I am sure that no such outcome was in the contemplation of the committee, and I have pointed it out because I think we ought to close the door to any such result as that.

I rose, however, only to call attention specifically to the fact that the negligent failure on the part of the director or officer or manager to do his duty makes him criminally liable, under the amendment of my colleague, only when the misapplication or the embezzlement is by a president or officer or director or manager of the common carrier, and therefore presumably would involve something more than the peculations of subordinate employees.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Iowa whether he would like to see the offense punishable by incarceration in the penitentiary under any circumstances, if the amendment of his colleague should prevail making mere negligence criminal?

Mr. CUMMINS. I would have latitude. I think the offense ought to be punished by imprisonment. The offense of willfully stealing from a common carrier or any other person ought to be punished by imprisonment; and if we make the negligent performance of the duties of a director or officer a crime, I think there ought to be very considerable latitude in the time of the imprisonment. Still, I believe it ought to result in incarceration.

Mr. STONE. Mr President, I desire to supplement one or two observations made in the course of the remarks of the Senator from Iowa, who has just taken his seat.

It seems to me that this section, taken as a whole, carries us a very long way from what I, at least, have understood was the line that separated the jurisdiction of the States and the jurisdiction of the General Government, at least in criminal procedure. It is rather remarkable to my mind that the Judiciary Committee, of all other committees of the Senate, should propose a statute that would confer upon a United States district court jurisdiction to indict, try, and condemn a member of a firm—not even a corporation, but a partnership entered into by private individuals in the State of Maryland, for example, to carry on a legitimate line of business which in its nature and in the course of its conduct became interstate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this is confined to common carriers; but the remarks which have just been made are just as applicable, because if we can do it with regard to common carriers we can do it with regard to every kind of business.

Mr. STONE. I was just going to remark that if you can do it in one insrance I see no reason why you can not in another. Now, you say here that it is confined to common carriers.

Mr. CULBERSON. Engaged in commerce.

Mr. STONE. Engaged in commerce.

Mr. CHILTON. That means interstate commerce.

Mr. STONE. It says interstate commerce; but, to make my statement as concrete as possible, suppose there should be a firm, a copartnership formed in the State of Maryland by private citizens to run a line of coaches from the State of Maryland into the District of Columbia, to carry passengers alone—that is interstate commerce; to carry freight alone, or to carry both—that is interstate commerce. Now, if a citizen of the State of Maryland, a member of that partnership, is accused in a Federal court of misusing the funds of that partnership or of that firm, he can be tried and condemned.

When has the jurisdiction and sovereignty of a State fallen so low that we can not depend upon the power and the official integrity of the Commonwealth to punish its own citizens for committing the crime of larceny or embezzlement within its own territory?

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. STONE. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Can not the United States, in the case the Senator names, for the protection of interstate commerce and the integrity of interstate commerce, make this act punishable in addition to the laws of the State? Does not its jurisdiction arise out of its authority to regulate interstate commerce, and all of the agencies connected with the carrying on of interstate commerce, so as to protect that commerce and the people interested in it?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, there can be no doubt that the Congress of the United States has constitutional power to regulate interstate commerce, and that that means it can regulate the agencies employed in the conduct of that commerce. It is possible that in such a case as I have stated, or in any case of like kind, the Congress can, if it will, confer jurisdiction upon the Federal courts to indict and punish such offenses as are defined here, committed by the officials of such a firm or such a corporation. But, Mr. President, I have always believed that the States themselves had jurisdiction in cases involving such a crime; that it is a part of the police power of the State; and that when we go from the civil regulation of interstate commerce into criminal jurisdiction, into the exercise of a police power, we are venturing very close to, if we are not trespassing upon, the line drawn between State and Federal sovereignty.

The Senator from West Virginia says that this section—9a—is in substance the same as a section in the national-bank laws for the punishment of directors and officials put in control and management of national banks, but the circumstances are wholly different. A national bank is a Federal corporation. The States have nothing to do with the organization of national banks. Those banks are under the exclusive jurisdiction and supervision of the National Government. In cases of involuntary liquidation the Federal Government, not the State government, takes control. They are national corporations and are responsible alone to the National Government. I think it is an entirely different situation from that we are meeting here now.

These corporations, these firms, these partnerships or associations referred to in section 9a of the pending bill, are organized and conducted primarily under State laws and subject to State jurisdiction and regulation. Why do we wish to take from the States the power or to trespass and encroach upon the power of the State to punish the officers or agents of these private corporations, associations, and firms by transferring in large part the jurisdiction in these enumerated criminal cases to the Federal courts? It seems to me we ought to leave it where it is—in the hands of the States.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. STONE. I yield the floor.

Mr. WHITE. Are we not now punishing larcenies that are committed on subjects of interstate commerce by Federal courts, and are we now for the first time invading the jurisdiction of the State courts, and are we depriving the State courts of their jurisdiction? Are we not simply conferring on Federal courts concurrent jurisdiction?

Mr. STONE. I think so, Mr. President. That argument perhaps is well taken, but it is another step of the many steps we are constantly taking in encroaching upon the power and integrity of State jurisdictions. Every man must know that if this becomes the law every little firm, every little association or corporation that can be said to be engaged in interstate commerce, becomes at once, so far as the criminal procedure goes, under the jurisdiction of the Federal courts; and there are hawk-eyed officials connected with those courts who will be only too quick to bring them to the attention of Federal grand juries; and citizens, instead of being tried as they now are by a jury of the vicinage, in their own neighborhoods, and by judges and prosecuting attorneys of their own selection, will be taken away to distant courts to be tried before judges who know nothing of them and before juries to whom they are strangers. I believe it is wiser and better and more American to let the citizens of a State be tried for offenses before a judge and jury of the vicinage where they live.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, possibly we are not taking the first step across the line, as the Senator has indicated. It may be, and probably is, the last step.

Mr. STONE. It seems to me it would be about the last step you could take in that direction.

Mr. WHITE. But the question is, Where are you going to draw the line of demarcation? The Constitution has drawn that line by declaring that Congress has power to regulate commerce between the States, and it does not make any exceptions. That provision of the Constitution applies just as well to the hack driver who crosses the line from Rosslyn, Va., to Washington, or from the city of Girard, in my State, to the city of Columbus, Ga., across the river, where street cars are operated from one side of the river to the other, from one State into the other State, and are therefore agencies of interstate commerce, subject to regulation by Congress.

I can very well see some good objections to the exercise of this power in extreme cases, such as are mentioned by the Senator from Missouri; but I would like to know from him where the Judiciary Committee was to draw the line. It has to be drawn somewhere if Congress is to exercise the power conferred on it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WHITE. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not know that there was a person in the world who could outrun me in a liberal construction of the Constitution of the United States. I find, however, that I have been mistaken about that. I rise to ask this question of the Senator from Alabama:

We all agree that whatever we do in this respect must be a regulation of commerce among the States or foreign nations, or it has no basis in our Constitution. Does the Senator from Alabama think we could make any act of larceny committed upon the property of any corporation doing an interstate business a Federal crime? Could we make it a Federal crime to break and enter and carry away a pound of steel from the United States Steel Corporation, a concern engaged in interstate commerce? Could we make it a Federal crime for one in the Senator's own State to break the glass in one of the doors of a hack that plied between his city and a neighboring city in an interstate way?

If we can do those things, we have carried the Constitution of the United States to a point I never dreamed it could be made to reach. I put those questions to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa seems to be delighted that he has found at least one person who keeps pace with him, if he does not go in advance of him, in extending the jurisdiction of the Federal courts, or in the liberality of construction of the Federal Constitution. I do not think it is a question of liberality of construction or of narrowness of construction. I think it is a necessary, natural construction. The lines between the States are the lines of demarcation with reference to commerce passing from one to the other. The Constitution in conferring power on Congress has drawn the line there; and those who engage in or become an agency in transporting that commerce place themselves under the power of Congress to regulate.

I will say to the Senator that I believe Congress has the power to make it an offense to steal property on a railroad car or steamboat while being carried from one State to another. I want to say, Mr. President, that that is not my view alone; it is the view of Congress.

Mr. CUMMINS. I accept that view. That has been done, and there is no question about it; but what about the question I put to the Senator from Alabama of the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. WHITE. I will be glad if the Senator will give his questions to me one at a time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. The United States Steel Corporation is engaged in commerce among the States, and is therefore subject to our regulations in so far as we may impose rules that do constitute regulations of commerce. Does the Senator from Alabama say that we could pass a law making it a Federal offense or crime to commit larceny against the property of the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. WHITE. Yes; if that property was in process of transportation from one State to another.

Mr. CUMMINS. But suppose it was not?

Mr. WHITE. Of course we could not.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why not?

Mr. WHITE. Because the Constitution has not conferred the power. We are without the power to do it. That is the answer.

Mr. CUMMINS. This paragraph says if these officers steal anything from a railroad company, no matter whether it is done in course of transportation or not, they shall be punished.

Mr. WHITE. That is a question for the Senator to put to the Judiciary Committee.

But, Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Iowa, How can we regulate commerce between the States if we can not regulate the men engaged in that commerce?

Mr. CUMMINS. I suppose the Senator would not contend that we could make it a Federal offense under the constitutional power for a president of a railroad corporation to beat his wife?

Mr. WHITE. Not unless he beat her while she was being transported from one State to another by one of the agencies of interstate commerce. Then we could try him and convict him for it and we ought to hang him.

I do not think, Mr. President, that we need now apprehend so much more danger from the Federal courts than we do from the State courts. The time has been, sir, when we had the right to fear and tremble when we heard their tread. But, Mr. President, that day has gone. The Federal courts then were treating some of the States of this Union as provinces—conquered provinces. To-day, however, they are all equal States in the Federal Union and have equal rights, and we have now upon the benches of those courts to preside over them men who are in sympathy with the people of the States in which they preside. There has been a great transformation, and I am glad of it.

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended to say; but I do want to say in answer to the criticism upon the Judiciary Committee by the Senator from Missouri, that when he says they ought not to make these things punishable, and illustrates his position by instancing transactions which might occur between Maryland and the District of Columbia in matters of transportation, along with that criticism he ought to suggest where the line of demarcation is and give the committee the benefit of it. I do not see where the committee can draw it elsewhere than where they have drawn it.

There is an amendment which I want to submit, to be considered hereafter. I will state what it is. It is to strike out the word "or," in line 9, page 17, between the word "officer" and the word "manager," and insert immediately after the word "manager" the words "or agent," so as to make it read:

Every person, director, officer, manager, or agent of any firm—

And so forth.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, if the Senate will look at the House provisions which came up to the Senate committee for its consideration it will see that the House considered that the jurisdiction of Congress over this subject extended much further than the Senate committee saw fit to extend it. The House bill deals with all corporations engaged in commerce and makes many provisions as to stocks and interlocking directorates, and so forth. We had in mind the arguments which have been made here, especially the reasons which have been assigned by the distinguished Senator from Missouri, and we thought, everything considered, we ought to take the beaten path, that we ought to go only into those fields where the jurisdiction of Congress is well known and well recognized.

It is strange, Mr. President, that the illustration given by the Senator from Missouri of the hack line between Baltimore and Washington was practically the only kind of overland interstate commerce which was in existence when the Constitution of the United States was framed and adopted. There can be no doubt that the framers of the Constitution and the States which ratified it had that kind of commerce in view. To take the Senator's illustration, I am not afraid to answer his question, and I have no hesitation in answering it. If we can regulate interstate commerce, which we can, if we can control it in that way, certainly we can say that it shall not be in the power of anyone to destroy interstate commerce. If Congress found out, for instance, that Indians destroyed the subject of interstate commerce, that they destroyed the wagons and the wheels, and the mules that hauled them, certainly it was in the power of Congress to make it a crime either for civilized persons or Indians to wantonly destroy them or to steal or take them away.

Therefore, whether we go back to the conception of interstate commerce which was in the minds of the fathers when the Constitution was adopted or take it as it has grown to be with our modern appliances, we are clearly within our rights when we say it shall be a crime to steal and take and carry away property absolutely needed in interstate commerce.

Mr. OVERMAN. Has it not often been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that the Federal Government has no police power at all?

Mr. CHILTON. No; it has not, stated in that way.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator knows that it has been decided frequently that the Federal Government has no police power.

Mr. CHILTON. Grant that it has not the police power specifically named; but, if in so far as we have been granted power, there is in that grant, or necessarily incident to it, the need of the exercise of the police power, then we have that much police power. The Constitution has not catalogued the grants to the Federal Government. Each grant carries all incidental powers necessary to the exercise of those granted, whether police or otherwise.

Mr. OVERMAN. Where and when did the Constitution grant the police power to the Federal Government?

Mr. CHILTON. I might as well ask the Senator the question, Where is there any mention in the Constitution of railroads? Railroads are not mentioned, but they are a part of interstate commerce or an instrument of interstate commerce. Taking it as an original proposition, Congress has no police power nor any other powers except those granted; yet it does exercise police power. It can exercise the power which the Constitution gives it the right to exercise. In so doing, it necessarily exercises powers originally belonging to the States. If in carrying out the purpose of the granted power it exercises what the States call the police power, that does not nullify the grant. A clearly granted power may be exercised by Congress, and with it such incidental powers as may be necessary to enjoy or exercise the granted power; and whether or not that shall trespass upon the police power takes nothing from nor adds nothing to the grant of power. Of course, there is no specific grant of police power, but we may use it as incident to another power.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator admits that there is no police power granted to the Federal Government by the Constitution.

Mr. CHILTON. I do not admit anything of the kind, stated as the Senator states it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator can not cite any clause of the Constitution which gives police power to the Federal Government.

Mr. CHILTON. Why should I have to do it? I have explained how and when we exercise powers which the States call police powers.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator has to do it, because the Supreme Court of the United States has time and time again stated that the Federal Government has no police power.

Mr. CHILTON. It is very funny that the Supreme Court has found it necessary to decide the same thing so many times. I am not aware of its doing so once.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator knows that in the Lottery cases, the first time this great encroachment was made on the right of the States, the Supreme Court said, "We know this power is not there, but we will go further than that on account of the conditions and circumstances of the case," and the associate justice warned the profession that they did not intend to carry the police power any further than they had done in the Lottery cases.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. CHILTON. I do, with pleasure.

Mr. SHIELDS. In reply to what the Senator said, it does not seem to me that there can be any doubt of the soundness of the proposition that the General Government has no police power except where it is necessary to effect some express power given by the Constitution, and it must be necessary for that purpose. If this provision of the bill is sustained, the courts have to find that it is necessary to punish the officers of a common carrier for misapplication of its funds in order to properly regulate interstate commerce. It occurs to me that it would be a very far-fetched construction for them to so hold.

The question I wish to ask the Senator from West Virginia is in regard to the constitutionality of the section under discussion. The Senator will remember that the first employers' liability act applied generally to all employees of common carriers engaged in interstate commerce, just as this applies to all the property and funds of such common carriers. That act, in a case reported in Two hundred and seventh United States, was held to be unconstitutional, because it applied to employees of carriers engaged in intrastate commerce as well as to those engaged in interstate commerce.

Now, the language of this bill will apply to any fund or assets of the common carrier, whether they be used in interstate commerce or in intrastate commerce. I think as it is now written it is invalid.

If the Senator from West Virginia will allow me, I wish to say here that I fully concur in what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has said. I think the courts of the States are ample to punish the crimes here denounced. You would have one law for a railroad agent and another for an agent of any other corporation. You will have one tribunal for one citizen and another for others. I do not think a discrimination ought to be made.

Further, this is not germane to the law we are considering. It has nothing to do with supplementing the Sherman law. It is true we may do it, but it is a matter that ought not to be included in this bill. It is foreign to the subject in hand. I am also against the policy of the provision, and I think it ought to be stricken from the bill. I am willing to trust to the laws of the States and the courts and juries of the States to punish larceny and embezzlement. They have never failed to do their duty in such matters.

Mr. CHILTON. This amendment applies to common carriers engaged in interstate commerce. That is a definite statement and is as easily understood as are the functions of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. President, we have gone so far as to say that in certain things we will control the hours of labor. Nobody is now going to question that kind of a statute. It is done under the interstate-commerce clause. We have regulated the transportation of diseased cattle.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have not attempted to regulate the working hours in the States.

Mr. CHILTON. It does not make any difference whether it is in the State or Territory or the District of Columbia if it be to regulate interstate commerce.

Mr. OVERMAN. We have control over national works, but not State work.

Mr. CHILTON. You have to regulate it in some place. Everything done in the world is done at some geographical point.

Mr. OVERMAN. You do not regulate it as far as the State is concerned. There is no national law to regulate it.

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly not; but would the Senator say we can regulate it so far as interstate commerce is concerned, but if it happens to be in a State we can have nothing to do with it?

Mr. OVERMAN. We can only regulate those engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, we have regulated safety appliances, and they have gone so far as to say that even where the car is in a State, still because it may go into a train and may become a part of an instrument of interstate commerce, that is within our power. There are too many good lawyers in the Senate for us to go over that beaten track.

Mr. President, common carriers engaged in interstate commerce are matters over which this Congress has absolute control, if we, in our judgment—and we are the last judge—as to how we shall regulate, find that it is necessary for us to regulate them in order to regulate commerce. The Supreme Court has said we have ample and complete jurisdiction. It was because of that ruling that we chose to confine this legislation to common carriers, so that not a line of it could be successfully questioned in the courts and we would be traveling clearly within the beaten path of the decisions.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is interstate commerce? A factory is not interstate commerce. Interstate commerce is that which enters into transportation going from one State to another State.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I understand that, and I do not want to go into those definitions simply because it is not necessary here. Here we are dealing with instruments of interstate commerce—common carriers. We are dealing with all common carriers alike. We propose this in order to regulate interstate commerce and in order to preserve the instruments of interstate commerce. As I said before, we may find a line engaged in interstate commerce that can not keep its property; it can not get honest men to protect it. It is reported in the public prints that great lines of railroad have been fleeced of their property by its high officials. If that continues, it may cripple the lines of communication between the States. This act proposes to avert that calamity.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish the Senator to answer this question: Is a director of an institution engaged in interstate commerce an instrumentality of interstate commerce?

Mr. CHILTON. We have found that in many cases they are not instruments at all, but dummies, and we want to keep them from being dummies.

Mr. KENYON. How about the man working for the interstate carrier? The Senator from North Carolina may suggest that he would be an instrumentality of commerce.

Mr. OVERMAN. Oh, no; there is a great distinction.

Mr. CHILTON. Take the case that has been mentioned here by so many. I do not want to bring it up again, but can not well avoid it. We find that the commerce of New England and the commerce of the great West, on account of mismanagement or crime, have been thrown topsy-turvy. The Interstate Commerce Commission does not understand how to regulate rates there on account of the misdeeds of certain corporations. You do not know whether you have to fix a rate that will respond with a reasonable profit to one capitalization that is honestly fixed or whether a different rate would apply and would be a reasonable rate for another or fictitious capitalization.

In other words, Mr. President, we have gone so far that we have found power to value every single interstate railroad carrier in this country. We are now valuing them. What for? For the purpose of fixing rates in this country, for the purpose of regulating them after finding out what is necessary in order to do the best by the people and by the stockholders of those railroads.

We are going into every detail because they are instruments of interstate commerce. I will now answer the Senator definitely. Simply because in a specific case the director may not be an interstate instrument, or simply because one piece of freight in a car might not be interstate commerce, does not make the law invalid. We have the general power over interstate commerce, and because intrastate commerce gets in the way, or can not be always found out of the way, we need not surrender our powers.

Mr. President, this proposed law was drawn with quite a good deal of care. A great deal of consideration was given to it. We had many of these arguments before us. We had these authorities before us. Rather than go into the doubtful field we chose to take the beaten path, to go on the line marked out by the decisions, and to deal only with these common carriers in this way. Legislation to regulate them seemed to be needed, and it was done for the greater reason that we wanted this law to be effective and we did not want to make it a source of practice for the lawyers and subject the people and the Government to all kinds of litigation and costs. We wanted to try these rules and regulations with common carriers engaged in interstate commerce, because the power of Congress as to them has been passed upon by the courts and because the abuses in the management of common carriers have become a matter of common knowledge and grave public concern.

I have not any doubt in the world that this is constitutional. I do not want to go over the arguments again; they are well known. At each step of reform in all of these matters we have the same arguments to go over, the same question to meet—Is it interstate commerce? It may be all interstate commerce; it may not be; some considerations may be the subject of interstate commerce, and may not be; some may be subjectively and some may be objectively. What is the use of going into that? The Supreme Court has held that we have power over these interstate common carriers and that our power is supreme over them if we be regulating commerce between the States. When we take hold of them for this purpose we have exclusive jurisdiction over them.

As I have said, if we have a right to regulate them we have the right to see that their property is appropriated for the purposes of interstate commerce and shall be used for no other purpose. If we have that power, we have the right to say that the instruments shall not steal away the subject but shall preserve it for the public. In doing that we are clearly exercising the rights and the powers given us by the Constitution.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this is no beaten path; no track has been laid out before by any Congress or by any court on earth. In fact, ever since the Constitution was adopted the Supreme Court of the United States has decided time and time again that we have no police power whatever. I am not going into the argument in this case except to say that no factory is interstate commerce, no railroad per se is interstate commerce. I say whenever a State charters a corporation and parts with a part of its visitatorial powers, the directors then elected are quasi State officers, and this Government has no power whatsoever, so far as its police power is concerned, to constitute an act a crime of which the directors of such a corporation may be guilty.

I want to read an extract—and I am going to read no more; I am not going to extend my remarks—to show what the Supreme Court has said. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] read from this case the other day in connection with another matter before the Senate. The court in this opinion said:

> No distinction is more popular to the common mind, or more clearly expressed in economic and political literature, than that between manufactures and commerce. Manufacture is transformation—the fashioning of raw materials into a change of form for use. The functions of commerce are different. The buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce.

What constitutes commerce? Buying and selling. What constitutes manufacture? Fashioning of the raw material. How can you extend the police power of the Federal Government and say that the director of a manufactory that fashions raw material shall be guilty of a crime?

Mr. CHILTON. We do not say that.

Mr. OVERMAN. You do. You say he shall be guilty of a penitentiary offense.

Mr. CHILTON. The provision applies to common carriers.

Mr. OVERMAN. Well, the director of a common carrier. What is the difference?

Mr. CHILTON. It does not apply to anything except a common carrier.

Mr. OVERMAN. The principle is the same. I read further from this opinion:

> The buying and selling and the transportation incidental thereto constitute commerce; and the regulation of commerce in the constitutional sense embraces the regulation at least of such transportation. The legal definition of the term, as given by this court in County of Mobile v. Kimball (102 U. S., 691, 702), is as follows—

And I call this to the attention of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. WHITE], because it is a case from his State—> in intercourse and traffic, including in these terms navigation and the transportation and transit of persons and property as well as the purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities." If it be held that the term includes the regulation of all such manufactures as are intended to be the subject of commercial transactions in the future, it is impossible to deny that it would also include all productive industries that contemplate the same thing. The result would be that Congress would be invested, to the exclusion of the States, with the power to regulate not only manufactures but also agriculture, horticulture, stock raising, domestic fisheries, mining—in short, every branch of human industry. For is there one of them that does not contemplate more or less clearly an interstate or foreign market? Does not the wheat grower of the Northwest and the cotton planter of the South plant, cultivate, and harvest his crop with an eye on the prices at Liverpool, New York, and Chicago? The power being vested in Congress and denied to the States, it would follow as an inevitable result that the duty would devolve on Congress to regulate all of these delicate, multiform, and vital interests—interests which in their nature are and must be local in all the details of their successful management.

> "Commerce with foreign countries and among the States, strictly considered, consists in—

> This being true, how can it further that object so to interpret the constitutional provision as to place upon Congress the obligation to exercise the supervisory powers just indicated?

Congress can not deal with such matters. I will not read more from this decision. It is unnecessary to extend this discussion. I think enough has been said about it. I do not think we have the power to do what is proposed.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not know whether or not enough has been said about it. Senators, I warn you that this matter ought not to be lightly passed. I regard it as an exceedingly serious question. We are proposing by this bill to transfer the exercise of the police power of the State to Federal jurisdiction. You mean not only to regulate commerce, as we have been doing through the Interstate Commerce Commission and otherwise, but to prescribe the rules and regulations for carrying on interstate commerce. By mandatory injunction we can compel those engaged in interstate commerce to perform certain acts or to desist from certain acts. The power of the Federal Government in the mere regulation of interstate commerce is wide and ample; but we are going to do now what we have not done before—we are going to authorize the Federal Government to intrude upon the States and indict officials and agents of State corporations and private firms and associations for the crime of larceny, of embezzlement, and other like offenses known to the statutes of every State. Think what will result!

Mr. President, the Department of Justice, like all the other departments of the Government, some larger, some smaller than others, has an army that are spying out over the country, alert, vigilant, often overzealous in their efforts to detect and to ferret out offenses against the laws of the Government of the United States. Offenders are carried into the grand jury room of the district courts of the United States; men are indicted by those grand juries, and the victims—and often they are victims—the citizen who is arraigned by the grand jury is taken from his home into a strange community miles away. Why, sir, in the great State of Texas, an empire in territorial domain, a man engaged in transporting passengers or freight from some border town across the line into New Mexico—engaged in interstate commerce—may be charged by a Federal grand jury with embezzling the funds or property of the firm of which he is a member, or the corporation of which he is an official, and taken 500 miles, more or less, to a jurisdiction to him unknown and before a court with whose procedure he has no familiarity, to be tried before a judge he never saw and of whom he knows nothing, and by a jury whose members are strangers, of whom he knows nothing and who know nothing of him.

Why, Mr. President, one of the safeguards against the abuse of power which has been written into the common law and into the statutes of our States requires that a man shall ordinarily and save in exceptional cases be arraigned and tried before and by a jury of the vicinage of the neighborhood where he lives and to whom he is known. It boots little that a man has lived an upright, moral, and manly life, building up a character that should stand in his support when accused, if he is to be taken miles away from his home where he is not known. His character is worth something to him; its value can not be overestimated when he is arraigned before a court or jury of his immediate fellow citizens, who are acquainted with him and are familiar with his career and standing. It is proposed to take him hundreds of miles away and introduce him into a Federal court, a court of our country—and no man honors the Federal judiciary more than I—but I can see that when he is taken before such a court he is suffering a disadvantage; at least he loses that advantage which clearly belongs to him when he is tried by a jury of his neighbors and the citizens of his immediate vicinity.

Here is what we are opening up; here is what this section proposes to do: It proposes to enable the Federal Government to thrust in its strong hand, grapple with the citizen and take him away from his home and his own people for trial before a far-distant tribunal, with which he is absolutely unfamiliar. I think it is a dangerous thing to do. I say again that we ought not to enact a statute with such possibilities in it and so unnecessary in itself. We ought not to do it without the gravest and most thoughtful consideration.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. STONE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CHILTON. I should like to ask the Senator what he thinks of the white-slave act, and if we may compare that kind of legislation with this?

Mr. STONE. I have had no occasion to familiarize myself with that act. Perhaps the Senator is in a position to explain it.

Mr. CHILTON. Did the Senator vote for it?

Mr. STONE. I presume I did.

Mr. CHILTON. I was not in the Senate, Mr. President, when that act was passed. I have my own opinion about it; but speaking of dragging people away and of exercising the police power, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that act to be constitutional and within our power, and it is now being enforced by the courts. That act was designed for the purpose of bringing about a great reform in interstate commerce. That is the theory upon which that act was passed, and it does seem to me that a Congress which passed that act should not hesitate now when an opportunity is presented to enact another great reform so much needed by situations all around us.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I merely want to add one word to the discussion of this particular section. To my mind it is a legitimate consequence of our departure from the true theory of trust regulation, or, rather, trust prohibition.

The act which we passed creating a Federal trade commission was to my mind as much of an invasion of the rights of the States as any act that ever received the sanction of the Senate. I endeavored at that time to emphasize the proposition that the prevention of monopoly by national legislation ought to be effected by some such measure as Senate bill 1138, which contents itself with imposing restrictions upon the agencies of interstate commerce which are created by the States, but as to which we have absolute power to impose restrictions. I also said then that whatever the purpose of that measure might be, the effect of it would be to regulate instead of to prevent monopoly.

Now, this bill is designed to supplement the trade commission bill. It therefore legitimately proceeds upon the theory that we have jurisdiction not only of everything affecting interstate commerce but of all of the instruments to be engaged in it. It is subject to all of the criticisms made so vigorously and eloquently by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], but it is a logical proposal in view of the assumption by Congress of the power to legislate with reference to every detail of interstate commerce, and we will go further than that before we get through. It is not too late yet to take up and enact Senate bill 1138, which will relieve us of all these difficulties and embarrassments, although I have no hope or expectation that Congress will do so.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, before this debate shall close I should like to read a clause from a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Southern Railway against the United States, reported in Two hundred and twenty-second United States. It is known as the safety-appliance case. I want to read from page 26, down to the bottom of that page, just this much:

> We come, then, to the question whether these acts are within the power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution, considering that they are not confined to vehicles used in moving interstate traffic, but embrace vehicles used in moving intrastate traffic. The answer to this question depends upon another, which is, Is there a real or substantial relation or connection between what is required by these acts in respect of vehicles used in moving intrastate traffic and the object which the acts obviously are designed to attain, namely, the safety of interstate commerce and of those who are employed in its movement? Or, stating it in another way: Is there such a close or direct relation or connection between the two classes of traffic when moving over the same railroad as to make it certain that the safety of the interstate traffic and of those who are employed in its movement will be promoted in a real or substantial sense by applying the requirements of these acts to vehicles used in moving the traffic which is intrastate as well as to those used in moving that which is interstate?
> If the answer to this question, as doubly stated, be in the affirmative, then the principal question must be answered in the same way. And this is so, not because Congress possesses any power to regulate intrastate commerce as such, but because its power to regulate interstate commerce is plenary, and competently may be exerted to secure the safety of the persons and property transported therein and of those who are employed in such transportation, no matter what may be the source of the dangers which threaten it. That is to say, it is no objection to such an exertion of this power that the dangers intended to be avoided arise in whole or in part out of matters connected with intrastate commerce.

I could not make a better answer to each and to every criticism made of this act than this decision makes; and I am willing to leave the subject, so far as I am concerned, with that in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, there is a feature of this matter of very profound importance in considering the wisdom or the policy of this legislation which ought to have some attention from the Senate.

I should like to inquire from the Senator from Missouri as well as from the Senator from Iowa whether, in the judgment of either of them, the enactment of this legislation will prevent or supersede prosecutions under the State law. That is to say, will the result be not only that the offender will be called upon to answer the charge against him in the Federal court, but will the additional result follow that the State court will no longer have any jurisdiction at all to punish? In other words, will the State statute be superseded so far as the subject of larceny or embezzlement is covered by this statute?

If that is the case, I question very seriously the wisdom of the enactment of this measure, even conceding that we have the constitutional power to pass it. Of course we are all familiar with the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States holding that when Congress passed the employers' liability law, covering the case of injuries to employees of companies engaged in interstate commerce, all State laws in relation to the subject became inoperative, and thereafter no right whatever could be predicated upon those statutes in behalf of one engaged in interstate commerce who was injured in that business.

I should like very much to have the opinion of the distinguished Senators I have named, and the opinion of the Senator from West Virginia as well, who seems to have given considerable thought to this subject, and who, according to my recollection, is the author of the section in question, as to whether the incorporation of this provision in the bill would or would not entirely supersede all State statutes in relation to embezzlement or larceny by any of the individuals referred to in the act, so that not only would they be subjected to punishment in the Federal courts, but they could not be subjected to punishment in the State courts.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will yield to me, before the question just put by the Senator from Montana is answered by the Senator from West Virginia or any other Senator I desire to add to what he has said with respect to the decision of the Supreme Court upon the employers' liability act another class of cases.

In 1906 the Senate adopted, as a part of the so-called Hepburn Act, what is known as the Carmack amendment, which attempted to deal wtih the liability of common carriers under a bill of lading. Theretofore most of the States in the Union had laws which prevented common carriers from stipulating against full liability for their negligence or for losses that occurred under such circumstances as made them liable. There was not a word concerning that particular matter in the Carmack amendment, but when the amendment came to be construed by the Supreme Court, first in the case of Adams Express Co. against Gröninger and afterwards in several other cases, the Supreme Court held that inasmuch as this was a regulation of interstate commerce and touched the subject of liability of common carriers under bills of lading, all the laws of the States touching that matter were abrogated and that these statutes and constructions of the common law which forbade common carriers from so limiting their liability were repealed or rendered ineffective, and that thereafter the liability of the common carriers must be determined upon the Carmack amendment as interpreted by the common law.

That was the reason, among others, why I called the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that here we find a series of felonies as regulations of commerce, the validity of which may be doubtful; but, conceding our right to pass the paragraph and to make these acts criminal under the Federal law, we attach a penalty of $500 in the discretion of the court, or imprisonment, or both; and I feared that unless something were done with it we would destroy the laws of the States respecting larceny by presidents and directors and officers of common carriers and substitute for those laws a most inadequate provision for punishment for similar crimes.

I simply wanted to add that to the statement of the Senator from Montana, so that the Senator from West Virginia could have the whole subject in mind when he answered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, since we have had one interruption, may I be permitted another?

If it is true that by making embezzlement by an officer of a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce a crime under the Federal statutes we thereby repeal or render innocuous the State statutes relating to the same subject matter, that is true because the subject matter is interstate commerce; and Congress having entered upon that field of legislation and legislated with reference to a particular matter, it is held that its legislation alone is governing. Now, if that is the case with reference to the directors of a corporation engaged in interstate commerce who embezzle the funds of the corporation, then why is it not true, when we have passed an act to regulate unfair competition, that in like manner we have repealed every State trust act so far as it may apply to any act of any concern engaged in interstate commerce?

I do not know where you draw the line between the two; and if the danger exists here that is suggested, then we have been indulging in a very dangerous practice by, in effect, repealing all the State statutes against trusts and monopolies, so far as they apply to interstate commerce, and substituting for their drastic remedies the remedy that is laid down in the trade commission bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether, in his judgment, the enactment of the Sherman Antitrust Act abrogated all State statutes on that subject?

Mr. REED. I do not think so; and the Senator will follow that with the question, Why, then, should the statute in regard to unfair competition abrogate them?

Mr. WALSH. Or the present statute.

Mr. REED. And I follow both questions with the question, Then, why should this bill, which proposes to make it a crime to embezzle the funds of a concern engaged in interstate commerce, repeal the State statutes in that regard?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I hesitate to express on a mere moment's reflection an opinion upon the question raised by my friend from Montana and by my colleague, but it seems to me that in the case of the Sherman antitrust law, or any other antitrust law amendatory of the original act, intended, as those acts are intended, primarily to reach interstate commerce and not strictly intrastate commerce, there would be no conflict, certainly no patent conflict, between such Federal statutes and statutes enacted by the legislature of a State regulating commerce within the borders of the State, or what we ordinarily denominate intrastate commerce. There is no line where the two would meet and conflict. They treat of different kinds of commerce.

Now, as to whether the insertion into the Federal statutes of this provision of the bill we are discussing wherein the provision prescribes punishment in the Federal courts for the crime of embezzlement, would, pro tanto, repeal the law of the State on embezzlement I am not certain, but let me put it in this way:

Suppose the Federal statute prescribes punishment by a fine of $500, or not exceeding $500, for embezzlement committed by an officer of a corporation or copartnership doing an interstate business, while on the other hand the State statute prescribes imprisonment for some stated period for the same crime committed by the same individual or class of individuals; then there would be a different punishment prescribed in the two jurisdictions. One would make it a mere misdemeanor, punishable by a simple fine. The other would denounce it as a felony, punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary. Then we find that an officer of a copartnership or a corporation organized under the laws of a State has embezzled funds belonging to that corporation engaged in interstate commerce. The Federal Government assumes to take control. It ignores the statute of the State which makes such an offense punishable with imprisonment, and declares that it shall be punished by fine alone.

Here are two jurisdictions assuming to control the same subject matter, exercising the right to hear and determine the same case on the same facts. Which controls? It would seem to me at first blush that the Federal statute, being enacted by Congress, the higher jurisdiction, enacted in pursuance of the Constitution of the United States giving to Congress full and exclusive control of interstate commerce, would supersede the State statutes; that the Federal jurisdiction would be the paramount jurisdiction.

Mr. President, if I am mistaken about that, then the accused party may be indicted or tried in either the State or the Federal court, and then he is subject to arraignment before either of two jurisdictions proceeding on different lines.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, does it not go further than that, if the Senator from Missouri please? To plead that a man had been formerly convicted in a State court would not help him out as to this statute, and to plead that he had been formerly convicted in the Federal court would not help him out as to the State statute. He could be punished under both.

Mr. STONE. The Senator may be right as to that. If he is, it simply magnifies the objection that ought to be urged against its passage.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am clearly right, because one is an offense against the State law and the other is an offense against the Federal law. It has been decided half a dozen times in half a dozen cities that a man found guilty of a certain offense could not plead that he had been convicted under the State statute when he was tried under the city ordinance.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, there is undoubtedly great force in the observation of the Senator from Mississippi, and as a matter of first impression I am disposed to agree with him in what he has said.

Mr. President, speaking for myself, I would rather a citizen of my State should be tried in the State court in his own county than that he be dragged away a hundred miles or more into what, so far as he is concerned in that particular emergency, is a foreign jurisdiction, an unsympathetic jurisdiction, an unfamiliar jurisdiction, and I plead here now to protect the people of my State against that menace conveyed in the provision offered in the bill, against which I raise my voice in protest.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator another question. If the Federal Government can take jurisdiction to punish the citizen of a State for embezzlement or grand or petit larceny when he happens to be president, director, officer, or manager of a firm or association engaged in interstate commerce, could we not equally well take jurisdiction to regulate his marriage and divorce for the same reason?

Mr. STONE. Why not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or for any other purpose.

Mr. STONE. Why not? I invoke Senators to pause and reflect before they incorporate such a provision as this in the statutes of the United States.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, in every State of the Union there are laws under which every crime here denounced can be punished—are punished when committed. The question here presented is, Shall the citizens of the several States be taken away from home, be taken out of the jurisdiction of their own courts, be denied the right to be tried by judges whom they have elected and who are responsible to them, and be tried before judges and jurors wholly unknown to them?

There is no question about the enforcement of the laws of the States covering every crime here denounced. This is simply a change of jurisdiction of these crimes from the State to the Federal courts. There is no reason or demand for such a change. It is for this reason I oppose it. I wish to call attention to the case of the Southern Railway against the United States, read by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] in answer to my suggestion that this law is unconstitutional, because it goes beyond the powers vested in Congress to regulate interstate commerce.

I suggested that a case reported in Two hundred and seventh United States, involving the employers' liability act, covered this question, and that under it this act was void.

That case was this: The first employers' liability act in terms applied to all employees of common carriers engaged in interstate commerce. It made no distinction between those employees who were engaged in interstate commerce and those who were engaged in local work in intrastate commerce solely. For that reason the court held the act void, because it covered commerce over which Congress had no power.

The new act was limited in its application to employees while engaged in interstate commerce, and the court sustained it.

It will not be controverted that the same corporations have property which they use only in intrastate commerce, while they have other property which they use in interstate commerce. This statute is not confined to property used in interstate commerce. It applies equally to that used in intrastate commerce, over which Congress has no power. The Southern Railway case read by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is not in point. I read the concluding paragraph or sentence read by the Senator:

> That is to say, it is no objection to such an exertion of this power that the dangers intended to be avoided arise in whole or in part out of matters connected with intrastate commerce.

"In whole or in part." Of course, if it applies wholly to funds used in interstate commerce, and it is a necessary or a proper police regulation, it comes within the power vested in Congress by the commerce clause. If it applies to funds which are used in part in interstate commerce it is also within the power of Congress, because the power vested in Congress over interstate commerce is paramount to that of the States. Interstate commerce and intrastate commerce are often closely related and so commingled that it is impossible to separate them. In such cases the Federal laws control because they are paramount.

But Congress has no more power over intrastate commerce than the States have over interstate commerce, and the law that applies to both is unconstitutional, whether passed by Congress or by a State.

All acts of Congress regulating interstate commerce supersede the laws of the States covering the same subject.

Indeed, in matters of general application, the States can not enact a statute that affects interstate commerce whether Congress has passed any or not. That was held in the case of Kidd against Pearson, reported in One hundred and twenty-eighth United States, and approved in many subsequent cases.

In the absence of Federal legislation the States may legislate concerning certain local matters; but when Congress does enact a law upon the subject, it supersedes everything that the State has done. This is well settled by many cases.

Now as to the question raised by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] a few moments ago, I join with him in his insistence that this statute does not come within the police power that Congress has incident to regulating State commerce. I will read from a case involving this question. It is the case of the United States v. Dewitt, found in 9 Wallace. The defendant was indicted under section 29 of the act of March 2, 1867, which declares—

> That no person shall mix for sale naphtha and illuminating oils, or shall knowingly sell or keep for sale, or offer for sale such mixture, or shall sell or offer for sale oil made from petroleum for illuminating purposes, inflammable at less temperature or fire test than 110° F.

And so forth.

This is sufficient to understand the opinion. The question was made for the defendant that the act was void because it was an invasion of the police power of the States, and beyond that incident to the power of taxation, and the court so held. The opinion was delivered by Chief Justice Chase:

> The questions certified resolved themselves into this: Has Congress power, under the Constitution, to prohibit trade within the limits of a State?
> That Congress has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes, the Constitution expressly declares. But this express grant of power to regulate commerce among the States has always been understood as limited by its terms, and as a virtual denial of any power to interfere with the internal trade and business of the separate States, except, indeed, as a necessary and proper means for carrying into execution some other power expressly granted or vested.
> It has been urged in argument that the provision under which this indictment was framed is within this exception; that the prohibition of the sale of the illuminating oil described in the indictment was in aid and support of the internal-revenue tax imposed on other illuminating oils. And we have been referred to provisions, supposed to be analogous, regulating the business of distilling liquors and the mode of packing various manufacturing articles; but the analogy appears to fail at the essential point, for the regulations referred to are restricted to the very articles which are the subject of taxation, and are plainly adapted to secure the collection of the tax imposed, while in the case before us no tax is imposed on the oils the sale of which is prohibited. If the prohibition, therefore, has any relation to taxation at all, it is merely that of increasing the production and sale of other oils, and, consequently, the revenue derived from them by excluding from the market the particular kind described.
> This consequence is too remote and too uncertain to warrant us in saying that the prohibition is an appropriate and plainly adapted means for carrying into execution the power of laying and collecting taxes.
> There is, indeed, no reason for saying that it was regarded by Congress as such a means, except that it is found in an act imposing internal duties. Standing by itself, it is plainly a regulation of police; and that it was so considered, if not by the Congress which enacted it, certainly by the succeeding Congress, may be inferred from the circumstance that while all special taxes on illuminating oils were repealed by the act of July 20, 1868, which subjects distillers and refiners to the tax on sales as manufacturers, this prohibition was left unrepealed.
> As a police regulation, relating exclusively to the internal trade of the States, it can only have effect where the legislative authority of Congress excludes, territorially, all State legislation, as, for example, in the District of Columbia. Within State limits it can have no constitutional operation. This has been so frequently declared by this court, results so obviously from the terms of the Constitution, and has been so fully explained and supported on former occasions that we think it unnecessary to enter again upon the discussion.

Mr. President, it seems to me that that case is directly in point upon this proposed statute, and that the application of this section to interstate commerce is entirely too remote as a police power to be exercised by Congress and to supersede that power, which is now so efficiently and so wholesomely exercised by every State constituting this Union.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I understand it is the purpose of the Senate to go into executive session in a few moments, and I wish to give notice of an amendment which I shall propose to the committee amendment, in section 9a, before the section is voted on. On page 17, line 14, after the word "corporation," I move to insert the words "arising or accruing from such commerce, in whole or in part."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Texas a question about that amendment. If that amendment were adopted, would the offense then be limited to an embezzlement or a misapplication of the earnings of an interstate carrier? In other words, would the paragraph extend to the misapplication of the proceeds of the securities that might have been sold? I ask that because if you are going to make the misapplication of some of the proceeds an offense we certainly ought to reach an improper diversion of the capital of a railway company or a common carrier as well as the earnings of a carrier.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the amendment is based on what is called the Shreveport rate case in the Supreme Court of the United States, two paragraphs of the opinion of which I will take the liberty of reading. That case was decided on June 8 of this year:

> This is not to say that Congress possesses the authority to regulate the internal commerce of a State as such, but that it does possess the power to foster and protect interstate commerce, and to take all measures necessary or appropriate to that end, although intrastate transactions of interstate carriers may thereby be controlled.

I will read another paragraph:

> It is for Congress to supply the needed correction where the relation between intrastate and interstate rates presents the evil to be corrected, and this it may do completely by reason of its control over the interstate carrier in all matters having such a close and substantial relation to interstate commerce that it is necessary or appropriate to exercise the control for the effective government of that commerce.

Now, in answer to the question of the Senator from Iowa, I will say that, in my judgment, under the amendment, if intrastate receipts were affected as well as interstate receipts, the statute would apply, nevertheless, but a conviction could be had, not with reference to intrastate trade or property but with reference to that affected by or received from or arising out of or accruing from the conduct of interstate commerce as defined in this bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I fear the Senator from Texas did not catch my point. My own opinion is that there is no difference constitutionally between the capital of a common carrier and the earnings of a common carrier, so far as congressional regulation is concerned; but I fear that the amendment which he has just offered would allow the officers and directors of a common carrier to embezzle or to misapply the capital of the company without punishment, and that the penalty would be attached only to the embezzlement of the earnings of the company; that is, the money received in interstate transportation.

Mr. CULBERSON. The amendment as presented would only apply to matters contained in the proposed committee amendment, which are "moneys, funds, credits, securities, property, or assets of such firm," and so forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. Will the Senator state how the language would read if his amendment to the amendment were adopted?

Mr. CULBERSON. After the word "corporation," line 14, on page 17, I move to insert the words "arising or accruing from such commerce in whole or in part."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think it is perfectly clear that the amendment would be limited to a degree that the Senator from Texas does not intend. It would then read:

SEC. 9a. Every president, director, officer, or manager of any firm, association, or corporation engaged in commerce as a common carrier, who embezzles, steals, abstracts, or willfully misapplies any of the moneys, funds, credits, securities, property, or assets of such firm, association, or corporation, arising or accruing from such commerce, in whole or in part.

That is the way the amendment would read should the Senator's amendment to it be adopted?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. The securities that are issued by a common carrier and sold on the market do not accrue from the operation of the road.

Mr. CULBERSON. But they arise out of it?

Mr. CUMMINS. They do not arise out of interstate commerce in which the company is engaged. They are the funds which are raised independently for the purpose of enabling the company to carry on interstate commerce. I suggest that words that would cover capital of that kind be included; otherwise this would merely be an invitation to embezzle capital without any penalty at all.

THE PRESIDENT'S APPEAL FOR NEUTRALITY.

Mr. STONE obtained the floor.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. STONE. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and as a public document the appeal of the President of the United States for neutrality.

Mr. KENYON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire what amendment is now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Iowa to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KENYON. I was under that impression, but I thought perhaps it had been displaced.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to having the article to which the Senator from West Virginia refers printed either as a public document or in the RECORD. Will not the Senator from West Virginia select either form in which he desires the article printed?

Mr. CHILTON. Why should it not be printed in both shapes? What is the objection to that?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows very well that it is not the policy nor has it been the policy of the Committee on Printing to print articles both in the RECORD and as public documents.

Mr. CHILTON. Then, I think this is a good time to change the policy. I ask unanimous consent to print this article both as a public document and in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia is a member of the Committee on Printing, and he certainly knows what the policy of the committee has been. He speaks as though he cares nothing whatever about what has been the policy of the committee in the past.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish this article to have the very widest circulation, to go to as many people as possible. I therefore want it printed in the RECORD and I wish it also printed as a public document. I do not think the Senator from Utah ought to object. This is an unusual case.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the article which the Senator desires to have printed?

Mr. CHILTON. It is the President's appeal for neutrality. It is a short, patriotic paper, which everybody ought to read.

Mr. SMOOT. I will not object; but I think it is against the rules of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the document is ordered to be printed as a public document and also to be printed in the RECORD.

The document (S. Doc. No. 566) referred to is as follows:

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY.

STATEMENT OF THE PRESIDENT.

"MY FELLOW COUNTRYMEN: I suppose that every thoughtful man in America has asked himself, during these last troubled weeks, what influence the European war may exert upon the United States, and I take the liberty of addressing a few words to you in order to point out that it is entirely within our own choice what its effects upon us will be and to urge very earnestly upon you the sort of speech and conduct which will best safeguard the Nation against distress and disaster.

"The effect of the war upon the United States will depend upon what American citizens say and do. Every man who really loves America will act and speak in the true spirit of neutrality, which is the spirit of impartiality and fairness and friendliness to all concerned. The spirit of the Nation in this critical matter will be determined largely by what individuals and society and those gathered in public meetings do and say, upon what newspapers and magazines contain, upon what ministers utter in their pulpits, and men proclaim as their opinions on the street.

"The people of the United States are drawn from many nations, and chiefly from the nations now at war. It is natural and inevitable that there should be the utmost variety of sympathy and desire among them with regard to the issues and circumstances of the conflict. Some will wish one nation, others another, to succeed in the momentous struggle. It will be easy to excite passion and difficult to allay it. Those responsible for exciting it will assume a heavy responsibility, responsibility for no less a thing than that the people of the United States, whose love of their country and whose loyalty to its Government should unite them as Americans all, bound in honor and affection to think first of her and her interests, may be divided in camps of hostile opinion, hot against each other, involved in the war itself in impulse and opinion if not in action.

"Such divisions among us would be fatal to our peace of mind and might seriously stand in the way of the proper performance of our duty as the one great nation at peace, the one people holding itself ready to play a part of impartial mediation and speak the counsels of peace and accommodation, not as a partisan, but as a friend.

"I venture, therefore, my fellow countrymen, to speak a solemn word of warning to you against that deepest, most subtle, most essential breach of neutrality which may spring out of partisanship, out of passionately taking sides. The United States must be neutral in fact as well as in name during these days that are to try men's souls. We must be impartial in thought as well as in action, must put a curb upon our sentiments as well as upon every transaction that might be construed as a preference of one party to the struggle before another.

"My thought is of America. I am speaking, I feel sure, the earnest wish and purpose of every thoughtful American that this great country of ours, which is, of course, the first in our thoughts and in our hearts, should show herself in this time of peculiar trial a Nation fit beyond others to exhibit the fine poise of undisturbed judgment, the dignity of self-control, the efficiency of dispassionate action; a Nation that neither sits in judgment upon others nor is disturbed in her own counsels, and which keeps herself fit and free to do what is honest and disinterested and truly serviceable for the peace of the world.

"Shall we not resolve to put upon ourselves the restraints which will bring to our people the happiness and the great and lasting influence for peace we covet for them?"

THE COTTON CROP.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement from cotton growers, merchants, bankers, and other business men of Rosedale, Bolivar County, Miss., in relation to the disposition of the cotton crop.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

To our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States:

The cotton growers, merchants, bankers, and other business men of Rosedale and vicinity would respectfully represent that by reason of the war prevailing among those nations that consume the bulk of our cotton, and the difficulty and dangers in transporting cotton to neutral nations and to those nations at war whose ports are still open, and the distracted, uncertain conditions of all trade and manufacturing business of those nations at war, embracing practically all the manufacturing countries of Europe, with the possibility of war extending to other nations of Europe and to Asia, confront the South with a calamity such as it has not faced since the great Civil War. The normal cotton crop of the South is from fourteen to fifteen million bales. Not exceeding 7,000,000 bales will be taken by the mills of the country and not more than 3,000,000 bales of American cotton will, under war conditions, be taken by the mills of other nations, leaving a surplus of between four and five million bales on the producers' hands. This will not only ruin the cotton raiser, but will cripple or ruin all the merchants and bankers in the cotton-growing States. It will leave such a surplus over in the hands of the producer that the combined strength of the merchants and bankers of the South can not carry it. Such conditions will force the cotton grower to rush his cotton on the market for such price as he can get for it and enable the buyers to fix their own price, and finally refuse to take cotton at any price, which will bring ruin and disaster on our people equal to war.

Why should the sins of Europe be visited upon our heads? Why should we be made to suffer for the wars of Europe? The people of this Nation demand that a Navy and Army be maintained at vast expense to protect this country in time of war. Great fortifications are erected and maintained at great cost to protect our cities from a possible enemy. Now, when war menaces, not only menaces, but is surely drawing its cordons around the great cotton-growing industry of the Nation, with certain destruction and ruin to follow if relief is not given from some source, why should not this Nation come to the rescue of its cotton growers? If we are not given relief, we will feel that we have been abandoned by the Nation. If California were invaded by an Asiatic nation, every southerner able to bear arms would rush to her rescue; if Massachusetts were invaded or threatened by any foreign power, Mississippi would be among the first to respond to her call. And we do not doubt that if this grave menace to the South, growing out of this gigantic European war, is properly put before the people of this Nation that from Maine to California they will respond to our call as we would respond to a danger call from them. A failure to grant this relief would dampen the splendid patriotism that now pervades the young men of the South. They would feel that they were not of the Nation. We would all feel that we had been abandoned in times of great trial and need by our fellow countrymen.

That a calamity such as we portray will follow a congested cotton market, such as will occur unless the Government gives relief, is taught by the history of 1893 and following years, when this Nation went from the double to the single money standard and nation-wide depression ensued.

It is equally certain that the mills will buy as cheaply and sell as high as the market price will permit. Now, we feel, we know, every Mississippian will do his duty, and we have abiding faith in the Congress of this Nation meeting the demands of this serious situation. The thing is this, to know exactly what to do, and this can best be done by having the views of those most deeply interested, as well as those not personally interested, so that the cool, fine brain of the representatives of the American people in Congress will find a solution that will maintain the price of the great product of the South and enable her to participate in the prosperity that will be enjoyed by the other sections of this Nation who will feed the warring nations and clothe them with our cotton.

This can be done without any risk or cost to the Government. It can be done at a profit—at a greater profit than the profit derived from the Panama Canal, the construction of which cost a sum equal to the amount necessary to carry over the surplus of this year's cotton crop.

We suggest:

First. That the cotton be stored in warehouses provided by the growers or other owners of cotton, such as shall be specified by the Government, at such points most convenient to them.

Second. That all cotton be stored in such warehouses shall be sampled and graded, which sample, grading, and classification to be made in duplicate, one sample and grading of the cotton thereof to be placed with the Government warehouseman, or such other agent or depository as Congress may provide, the other sample and classification to be given to the owner.

Third. That a valuation of not less than 12 cents per pound be placed upon all middling cotton so stored or deposited in such warehouses.

Fourth. That the expense of building or providing warehouses, the handling and storing, weighing, sampling, and grading of such cotton to be borne by the owner of cotton so stored.

Fifth. Interest on the money advanced by the Government on cotton so stored to be 4 per cent.

Sixth. That the storer of cotton shall pay insurance at rate to be fixed by Congress, the insurance policy to be deposited with the Government as collateral security, or the Government insure and make it a charge on the cotton.

Seventh. All who avail themselves of the privilege of storing cotton in Government warehouses shall contract and agree to reduce their cotton acreage next year on a scale to be fixed by Congress, with such forfeitures and penalties as may be provided by Congress.

The rapidly rising prices of provisions and all other products make it imperative that cotton be maintained at and around 12 cents per pound. The price of cotton stood at 13¼ cents per pound, middling cotton, when war was declared in Europe. Twelve cents per pound is 1¼ cents per pound under the price which the producer was receiving for his cotton at that time, and would get if war did not prevail in Europe. This cuts the price of cotton about 20 per cent, while all other products are rising at a rapid rate. Bear in mind, the depression that occurred and the bankruptcy that prevailed in the South in 1893, and the succeeding years, when cotton fluctuated at from 4 to 7 cents per pound, though all other products were driven to the lowest level. Wheat, at 25 to 35 cents per bushel; corn, at 15 cents per bushel; mules, at $50 to $75 each; and horses being fed to chickens. Now, with all prices soaring to the skies, which the South must pay with her low-priced product, 12 cents per pound is full low, and will leave the producer only a small margin with which to change from cotton to grain and other products next year. It is absolutely certain that the carry-over price advanced on cotton by the Government will fix the price of cotton, as the buyers will merely shade this price in order to induce sale. So it is of paramount importance that the price be fixed at not less than 12 cents per pound.

With the low prices of cotton and the high prices of foodstuffs, the bankers and merchants of the South will have their hands full to finance the South the coming year. Nothing but the aid of the Government can avert the great calamity that will befall the South if the gigantic destructive war, now prevailing in Europe lasts six months; and we urge you to use your uttermost energies, talents, and influence to avert the great calamity that threatens the South.

With abiding faith in your patriotism to your Nation and loyalty to and love for your own people, we, your fellow citizens, submit this address and suggestion.

WALTER SILLERS, Chairman.
W. H. FITZGERALD, Secretary.

FORMS OF CERTIFICATE OF ELECTION.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. KERN. I present the resolution which I send to the desk. It has been submitted to Senators on the other side. It is with reference to the form of credentials of Senators who have been chosen under the new constitutional amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 444) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate the following are convenient and sufficient forms of election of a Senator or the appointment of a Senator, to be signed by the executive of any State in pursuance of the Constitution and the statutes of the United States:

"To the President of the Senate of the United States:

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

I find in the RECORD of August 17, page 13840, on the vote on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], I am recorded as having voted "nay." I do not complain that it is an error on the part of the clerks, but if I voted "nay"—and I do not say that I did not—it was not my intention. My desire was to have voted "yea." I refer to the vote on the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], where he said:

Mr. President, in view of the action just taken by the Senate, I move that the Senate recede from its amendment to the House bill and adopt the House bill.

As I said, I am recorded as having voted "nay." I desired and intended to have voted "yea." I understand that as that was on the 17th and to-day is the 20th it may be quite impossible to correct the RECORD of that day. In fact, it is not possible, for it has already been printed. I only ask that this statement may go before the country.

I was not in favor of the conference report, and voted against it. I am in favor of a system of Government-owned craft for merchant marine, and hence would very readily favor a method that would tend somewhat to accomplish that, as was proposed in the House bill.

If I may be permitted a little latitude on this general subject, without interfering or taking any length of time, I desire to say a few words in connection with this proposition.

I felt happy this morning—in fact, I am generally fairly happy—but to-day I feel exceedingly pleased and profoundly grateful for the action of the President in his declaration in favor of and acquiesence in the plan to appropriate $30,000,000 for the purchase of ocean ships that shall bear our commerce, the crops of our fields, the work of our looms, and the products of our furnaces and anvils to the ports of the globe, there to feed the hungry mouths and clothe the naked of the world. I congratulate the country that we have a President with a scope of mind so broad and so patriotic as to have seized upon this plan.

This policy I have urged for many years, both as to railroads and as to marine, and I most earnestly felicitate my countrymen on this step of advance.

I feel that this is but the initial step to a great merchant marine for this country. I believe that we shall yet deck the blue ocean with American craft flying the American flag at the masthead. That they may sail on to every clime, carrying the evidences of our blessings and civilization from this land of constitutional liberty, is my hope and my prayer. This is an American plan to revive the American merchant marine. It shall have my most earnest and warm support.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The permanent RECORD will be corrected as the Senator requests.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not claim that it is an error on the part of the clerk. I want that distinctly understood. There was quite a good deal of excitement at that particular time, and I may have voted "nay" where I meant to vote "yea."

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the privilege of the Senator to have the correction made in the permanent RECORD.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I thank you.

TRADE WITH SOUTH AMERICA.

Mr. WEEKS. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution and have it read and referred to the Committee on Commerce. It is an important matter connected with shipping legislation, and I think it ought to be given early consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 443) was read and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

Whereas the larger part of the foreign trade of South American countries is carried on with European nations which are now in a state of war, this trade aggregating $1,600,000,000 a year; and

Whereas it is desirable that, as far as possible, this trade be diverted, to the United States; and

Whereas it is not only desirable but necessary that early and prompt action be taken to call to the attention of the people of South America the quality and varied character of our manufactures and products; Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, directed to cause to be prepared, in detail, an estimate of the probable cost of sending at least six vessels now in the military or naval service of the United States or otherwise to the principal ports of South America, such vessels to carry suitable samples of the manufactures and products of this country, together with a reasonable number of representatives of business or trade organizations, and to adopt such other means as may to him be deemed advisable, to the end that our manufacturers and producers may be forthwith put in direct contact with the markets of South America; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, further directed to furnish the Senate an expression of his opinion as to the feasibility of such an undertaking, such other methods, if any, which should be adopted, and the time within which suitable vessels, samples, and representatives of trade and business organizations may be assembled for the purposes referred to.

RURAL CREDITS.

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of rural credits.

R. 17857) to provide for appointment to places under the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, within two days.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to file minority views within two days on the bills he mentions. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HINDU IMMIGRATION.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD President Wilson's warning to the American people on the subject of neutrality. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 14155 and agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 14155) to amend an act of Congress approved March 28, 1900 (Stat. L., p. 52), entitled "An act granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing an experiment station of the Kansas State Agricultural College and a western branch of the State Normal School thereon, and for a public park."

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill, the title of which has just been reported, and agree to the Senate amendments. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas what is the significance of the Senate amendments?

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. It is only to make more definite the citation of the statute and to amend the title.

Mr. MURDOCK. The only change the Senate has made is one making more definite the reference to the statute?

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas. That is all.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

The title was amended to conform with the text.

On motion of Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate amendments were agreed to was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Carr, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6315. An act to authorize the Great Western Land Co., of Missouri, to construct a bridge across Black River.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment House joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 246. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to grant a revocable license for the use of the lands adjoining the national cemetery near Nashville, Tenn., for public-road purposes.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 11740. An act to amend an act entitled "An act creating a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska and conferring legislative power thereon, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912; and

H. R. 92. An act to extend the general land laws to the former Fort Bridger Military Reservation in Wyoming.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 5739. An act to present the steam launch Louise, now employed in the construction of the Panama Canal, to the French Government; and

S. 5197. An act granting public lands to the city and county of Denver, in the State of Colorado, for public-park purposes.

LOCATORS OF OIL AND GAS LANDS.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on Senate bill 5673, an act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands," and ask unanimous consent for its adoption. The Senate receded from the position taken by the House, and the conference report is to do precisely what the House did when the bill was passed. There should have been a statement filed, but there has been none filed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the conference report.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT.

The conferees on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5673) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States or their successors in interest,' approved March 2, 1911," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House and agree to the same.

KEY PITTMAN,
WILLIAM HUGHES,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SCOTT FERRIS,
EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
BURTON L. FRENCH,
Managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the question is on asking unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report.

Mr. FERRIS. I make that request, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report. When that is stated, I will state to the Speaker why.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois says that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] has to ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the conference report, and the Speaker would like to know why.

Mr. MANN. That is the gentleman's request.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair should put the request of Members in the exact language used on the floor, half of the time it would make the RECORD ridiculous.

Mr. MANN. There has been no conference report presented to the House. Is that a sufficient reason?

The SPEAKER. That is sufficient; yes.

Mr. MANN. Now, the gentleman makes a request for the present consideration of a conference report.

The SPEAKER. Has this conference report ever been printed in the RECORD?

Mr. MANN. It has never been presented to the House.

The SPEAKER. It was just presented a while ago, but does not appear to have been printed in the RECORD. It takes unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report without printing it in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, the Speaker is in error about one thing. While the conference report was read just now it was a conference report presented to the Senate and not a conference report to the House. The House conferees through inadvertence did not present any conference report to the House at all.

The SPEAKER. What is this conference report that we have here?

Mr. MANN. It is a conference report presented to the Senate signed by the conferees with the names of the Senate conferees coming first. Of course that is a matter of form. It was acted upon by the Senate and transmitted by a message to the House. What we have here is a conference report presented to the Senate. I shall make no objection to agreeing to this conference report, although I think it is a pretty ragged practice.

The SPEAKER. The Chair agrees with the gentleman from Illinois about that. The Chair supposed, as he had a right to assume, that it was a conference report in due form which had been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, it is fair to say that what the gentleman from Illinois says is true. The Senate did not furnish us with a duplicate copy of the conference report.

The result is that until last night I did not know that the conference report was adopted and sent over here. Last night I discovered the conference report upon the table, or at least half of it, and I ascertained that the Senate had receded from everything they contended for, and that there was brought back to us precisely what the House passed by unanimous consent. I thought in view of that that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the House would be willing to obviate the formality of making a statement and going over and getting a duplicate copy and printing it in the RECORD under the rule. Of course, if the gentleman objects, we can go through that form.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, what I have said was said because I did not wish managers on the part of the House in conference to get the idea that they can have a conference report adopted by simply signing one copy of the conference report, and letting that go to the Senate, and then come from the Senate to the House, without making any conference report to the House. I understand the present circumstances, and I am not seeking to make any criticism in the present case, but House conferees with more experience will learn that it is quite essential to the proper procedure in the House to present a conference report to the House with the names of the managers on the part of the House signed first, and also a statement.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I will state that the managers on the part of the House knew everything that the gentleman has said, and we very emphatically lectured the managers on behalf of the Senate, and it was through some oversight that this matter got in that form. I may say further, that it is a Senate bill, and our distinguished representatives at the other end of the Capitol assumed the responsibility of preparing the report, and did not prepare it correctly.

Mr. MANN. The fact is the conference report ought to have been presented first to the House under the practice of the two bodies. It could not have been acted upon otherwise, but now we are going through a rather slipshod method. Here was a House amendment to a Senate bill, disagreed to first in the Senate and a conference asked for. The House agreed to the conference, and the rule is that the House which agrees to the conference acts upon the conference report first. I think the gentlemen on the conference committee who watched the matter were not fully familiar with the practice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object to the conference report. I regret that this legislation is not in somewhat different form. It deals with an important subject, which at the present time particularly interests the people of California and some people in my State. The fact is that the conference report as we have adopted it does not relate to many cases which are not fully cared for under a fair interpretation of an amendment adopted some time ago to the withdrawal act. In other words, practically all that we are doing now is to say to the Secretary of the Interior, "If you will not obey the law and give people rights which the law has granted to them, then you may make an agreement with them whereby you will impound the resources of their property—such part as you desire—until some time in the future the question of ownership title shall be decided." There is pending another bill which relates to similar cases and which would give more permanent relief than this bill does. I regret that that bill was not adopted as part of the conference report, although I realize that that matter can be cared for on the general leasing bill which will be taken up later, but which we all know will not become a law at this session of Congress.

One thing more. The bill as it passed the House is unfortunate, it seems to me, in that it leaves entirely in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior whether he shall impound all of the product of the wells on the lands which may be brought within the provisions of the bill or whether he shall impound a portion of those proceeds, such portion as would be a reasonable royalty. The gentlemen on the committee say that they understood that the Secretary will impound such proportion of the proceeds as would constitute a reasonable royalty. That would be the logical and reasonable and proper thing to do. That is what we hope the Secretary will do, but the Secretary has much broader power than that, and I fear that in some cases he will be importuned to take action which will not afford these people much relief. I trust that in carrying out the provisions of the law he will proceed upon the assumption that these people having applied for title, he, while the matter is under consideration, may be allowed to operate freely and receive and keep all the oil or gas taken from the land except such portion of it as would make a fair and reasonable royalty if the application for title shall finally be denied. The fact is, however, that most of the people who can come under the provisions of the bill in its amended form are so clearly entitled to a patent that it should be granted without delay.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS BLACK RIVER, MO.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill S. 6315, to authorize the Great Western Land Co., of Missouri, to construct a bridge across Black River, and to consider the same at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there a bill of similar tenor upon the House Calendar?

Mr. RUSSELL. There is a bill of exactly the same words on the House Calendar, that has already been favorably reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and consider at this time the bill S. 6315, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Great Western Land Co., a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Missouri, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across Black River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, in the northwest quarter of section 5, township 22 north, range 7 east, of the fifth principal meridian, in the county of Butler, in the State of Missouri, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill (H. R. 17511) of similar import on the House Calendar will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

WATER POWER ON THE PUELIC DOMAIN.

The SPEAKER. Under the special rule the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16673, with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] in the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16673, with Mr. FITZGERALD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16673) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I believe under the agreement which was reached I was to have 10 minutes. Is that correct?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my amendment strikes out, on page 4, lines 3 to 6, the following words:

That the physical combination of plants or lines for the generation, distribution, and use of power or energy under this act or under leases given hereunder may be permitted, in the discretion of the Secretary.

Now, in considering this provision it should be borne in mind that there is nothing in this bill which prohibits the Secretary of the Interior from leasing more than one water power to the same person or the same combination of persons. The Secretary could lease all the water power, or, rather, all the land controlling water power in the entire public domain, to one person, or he could lease it to various companies with interlocking directorate representing the same people. In other words, there is nothing in the bill anywhere which in anywise restricts the Secretary from doing as he pleases. Now, that being true, without this provision in the bill, what is the situation with regard to combinations? Combinations would be restricted in three ways—first, combinations would be unlawful if in violation of the antitrust laws; second, combinations could be proceeded against if they violated the prohibition of the common law relative to the restraint of commerce and trade; and, third, and more important than all, combinations are more or less restricted or prohibited by public-service commissions within the States. Therefore, with or without this provision in the bill, the Secretary has unlimited power to lease to combinations. The only restriction in the exercise of the power would be the prohibition of the common and statute law and the prohibition of public-service commissions. This provision does not limit the power of the Secretary; it is rather a suggestion to him that he allow physical combinations of plants, and if it has any legal force or effect at all, or can have any, its effect would be to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to allow combinations which might come within the prohibition of the antitrust statutes, allow combinations which might be contrary to the spirit of the common-law provisions against restraint of trade. He might allow combinations in the face of the prohibition of such combinations by public-service commissions. This is what we are proposing to give the Secretary of the Interior power to do. We give, first, the power to do as he pleases, to lease all to one person or one corporation, and then, in addition to that, we say to him that if he does not happen to lease all to one corporation he may go on and allow the few that you have leased to to combine without regard to the statute law, without regard to the common law, without regard to the prohibition of the public-service commission within the State.

Why talk about granting unlimited power? I can not conceive of any provision that could be drawn that would go further than this. You place in the hands of one man power to allow combinations that may be not only in derogation of the public interest, but combinations prohibited by public-service regulation, prohibited by the common and statute laws. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] the other day, in excusing the extraordinary power placed in the hands of the Secretary by this bill, stated, quoting Mr. Pinchot, that you must grant great power to somebody, power under which great harm might be done, under which a man might work evil in order that he might have power to do good. Why, that is a doctrine as old as tyranny, as old as despotism and autocracy, as old as the doctrine of the divine right of kings. That is the kind of doctrine under which the Germanic Empires of Europe placed in the hands of two men—Kaiser and Emperor—the right to declare war with all the world. They must have the power, it was said, that they might defend their people against invasion; but that right to declare war against invasion was used, many people think, to declare war—a war of ambition and of conquest, war for the maintenance of kingly power, war against democracy the world over and in favor of special privilege. That doctrine which Mr. Pinchot announces is the same doctrine under which men have had their rights denied from the beginning of time, under which tyranny has flourished, under which rights have been filched from the people as a whole in order that they might be placed in the hands of the privileged few. Another peculiar doctrine embraced in this legislation, which Mr. Pinchot and some of those who agree with him have loudly proclaimed, is the doctrine of licensing monopoly. Most of us are against the creation of monopoly, and our statutes and common law are aimed at preventing and destroying it, but there is a certain class of gentlemen who have been prominent in the last few years who have a new doctrine. They would license monopoly in the vain hope that those who have the power to license may be able to control and will be wise enough and honest enough, if they have the power, to control it in the interest of the people. If the history of the human race teaches any one thing above another, it is that it is not safe to lodge in the hands of any man, no matter how wise, how good, how well intentioned, wide power of discretion over those things that have to do with the happiness and the prosperity of the people.

We are certainly departing from the doctrines of our fathers, from the principles on which the Nation was founded and under which it has flourished, when we go back to those ancient and discredited doctrines that we should place unlimited power over the interests of the people in the hands of a single man, or a few men, in the hope, forsooth, that they may use that power in the public interest. [Applause.]

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I believe under the order I am entitled to 10 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to 10 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] such time as he may wish to use within the 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall follow in this case whatever the committee determines to do in reference to it. This section relates to the regulation and control of service and charges for service to consumers, and issuance of stocks and bonds by the company, and gives to the Secretary of the Interior the absolute control wherever the transmission lines extend into two States. It was stated in the general debate, when I addressed the committee for a few moments, that the Committee on the Public Lands had in mind the following of the theory of interstate-commerce laws in reference to railroad rates. I do not feel disposed to criticize the proposition that Congress shall give to the Secretary of the Interior the absolute control over the rates to be charged by these companies for the electric power generated. And yet I have a good deal of hesitation in subscribing to the idea that the Secretary of the Interior should have that power where the public-utilities commission of the State has the power within the limits of the State. It may be necessary to give to the Secretary of the Interior the power to control rates where the current passes across a State line. I do not know whether the public-utilities commission of either State would have control of that; but where the power is consumed within a State after it has crossed a State line, or where a plant itself is within the limits of a State, and most of the power is consumed in that State, I do not feel confident that the Secretary of the Interior ought to be allowed to usurp the functions of a State commission and control within that State. I had intended to offer an amendment upon that subject, and had one prepared, but I concluded that I would not. I call the matter to the attention of the gentlemen interested in the bill. I do not know what the constitutional proposition would be. Say we authorize, for instance, the creation of an electric-power plant on an Indian reservation in the State of Wisconsin. We have control of the Indian reservation. Now, suppose we have a power plant there which runs a line across into Minnesota or Illinois. Have we the power to take away from the State of Wisconsin the right to control the charges which are to be made within the State of Wisconsin simply because we happen to have title to an Indian reservation in Wisconsin? And if we have the power to do it, is it a desirable thing to do?

The Interstate Commerce Commission exercises control over interstate rates. It never has attempted to exercise control over rates wholly within a State; it never has been given the power to do that. The Supreme Court intimated recently in a decision that Congress might have the power to control interstate rates, and, in addition, intrastate rates, because they are bound so closely in the management of a railroad corporation in connection with its interstate rates. Yet no one has yet proposed, so far as I know or can recall, in the House or the Senate that we should give to the Interstate Commerce Commission power to control all railroad rates, both the local rates and the interstate rates. Shall we do it here? I think that is a matter that ought to be very carefully considered before we determine that the Secretary of the Interior, located in Washington, shall control the rates of every company that may have a plant in California which extends a line over into Nevada—both the local rates and the interstate rates.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think there can be no question on the part of those who have studied this bill as a whole that it would perfect the bill if this entire section was stricken out and a new provision framed. It is rather confusing and conflicting in its terms. Here in the first part we authorize the Secretary of the Interior to initiate rates in the States where they transmit power in more than two States. Then the provision in the last clause is predicated on the idea that the Secretary of the Interior has not the power to initiate the rates, but that the company has the power to fix and maintain the rates. But further than that, I can not see any reason for supplementing in this bill the Sherman antitrust law by this last provision, which will only add to the confusion that will certainly arise by forcing upon the Supreme Court another construction as to the meaning of that clause.

Thirdly, I do not believe it is advisable to permit and lodge in the power of the Secretary of the Interior the privilege of authorizing a combination of plants. There may be isolated cases where it might be expedient, but I think there are any number of cases where it would be unadvisable to lodge that great power in the hands of any person. The history of the development of water power in this country under private control shows that it tends entirely to one control, and some of us have been thinking that by the inauguration of this legislation we would establish individual competitors to develop and control these large individual projects on the public domain which would act as competitors. And yet here in this first provision of the proviso you are giving recognition to that very practice which everybody believes is the bane of hydroelectric power in this country under the Water Power Trust. I hope that the committee will not only strike out the proviso as proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], but that they will go so far as to strike out the whole section entirely and substitute a provision giving the Secretary power to levy the rates in States where no public-utility commission exists. It is confusing. It is loosely drawn. It is hard to understand what is really the meaning of the framers of the bill. It is conflicting in its phraseology.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has pointed out a very great objection as to the right of the Secretary of the Interior to determine what the rates shall be for power generated, where it happens to be consumed in more than one State, for instance, if power should be developed upon the Menominee Indian Reservation in Wisconsin and conveyed also to Minnesota. As to that power when it passes over into Minnesota, with that State having a commission, why should not it have the supreme right to determine what should be the rates for the power consumed in that State? Why should you lodge that power in the Secretary of the Interior? I think that any person who studies this section closely and sees its conflicting provisions will realize there is no reason why this power should be lodged in the Secretary of the Interior, except in the isolated cases of power generated in a Territory. Well, that only applies to Alaska, anyway. We can make some provision as to that separate and isolated case. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, under the tentative arrangement made on Saturday the committee had 10 minutes, and I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman, I was greatly impressed with the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], but there is this difference between a railroad corporation which takes freight across State lines and a generating plant for the transmission of electricity across State lines: In the case where a power line crosses the State line it is necessary that some governmental power should control, because otherwise there would be confusion in adjusting the rates. Where the power under this bill, however, is generated in a State and all distributed within that State, I do not hesitate to say that I think the State should have the control of that distribution, and not the central power.

The difficulty is, however, that electrical power can be transferred so easily that in almost all instances it will cross a State line. In the case of a railroad, where the railroad crosses a State line, it may originate freight within the State and be delivered exclusively within the State. I do not know that there is any dispute about that; that it should in that case be controlled by the State. And the same rule should be followed in the matter of the transmission of both freight and electric power. It can be applied without confusion as to control, on the one hand, by the State authority and, on the other hand, by the Federal Government. The State in every instance should control in such matters exclusively within the State. It is only in the case of electrical power that it is a little different in the crossing of a State line, in this, that it will hardly be possible for an electric plant to be established without some power crossing a State line from the plant. If the gentleman can suggest an amendment, that will not create confusion in the actual working, to some such effect as this, analogous to freight crossing a State line, that when electric power crosses a State line the State into which it passes shall have control of its use and distribution within its own boundaries, even if the plant which created it is in another State, I will support it. The truth is, I am personally inclined to conclude that some such solution of the obvious difficulty will have to be finally adopted.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is recognized.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as I understand the parliamentary situation, the motion of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] aims to strike out lines 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, down to the word "Secretary," in line 6 of page 4, which permit the combination of plants.

The object of that part of the section is to permit two separate, independent plants to join and connect their wires, so that the one which has plenty of power and plenty of water may furnish power, for the time being or otherwise, to the other plant that may be short in water power or that may be short in fuel, and thus effect a saving of the material.

That is all the power that is conferred, and the testimony had before the committee shows conclusively that it is to the interest of conserving the water that is stored in the reservoir, that it is to the interest of both plants, when one for the time being has more power or more material to furnish power and a small number of consumers, and, on the other hand, the other plant has a large number of consumers, or those who desire to consume it, and a small amount of energy reserved in its reservoir. They may join and use that, so that all can obtain it. It simply requires the connecting of the wires of the two great plants. They may cover some four or five States.

This is illustrated by the Georgia situation, where sometimes the plants cover some four States, where it was shown that they can connect, and indicates how beneficial it would be to the consumer, and how it would cheapen the price to him; how it would really be a conservation of the power that was there, in the shape of water in the reservoir, to allow it to be used when it ought to be or when the streams are low, in order that they may obtain it from their neighbor. It is not intended for a combination at all.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COOPER. If such a connection were made the control of rates to consumers would still be under some public authority?

Mr. RAKER. Absolutely. If it should be in two States or three, and they had a public-service commission, it would be under their control absolutely; and if not, it would be under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. The gentleman may well see that one plant may have an abundance of water stored in its reservoir and no extra plant or extra machinery needed, and with a connection, say, of 10 or 20 miles of wire, they could both use them to advantage.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] offered no amendment, I think we have the right to assume that the paragraph as it stands—perhaps not as strong as it should be written and as we all desire that it should be written—is perhaps the best we can do with the lights before us. In any event, it confers on the Interior Department now the power to do for the Federal Government what we think ought to be done, and whether some gentleman wants it committed to the Interstate Commerce Commission and another to the President and the Secretary of War, I think we have done the best we could under the circumstances; so that I intend to address my remarks now to the statement made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a word?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; gladly.

Mr. MANN. I did not offer an amendment because I think the provision is so bad that I am sure the gentleman from Oklahoma will at the proper time correct it.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is sufficiently astute as to amendments to justify me in believing that if he thought the provision was as bad as that he would have offered an amendment.

Now, I want to confine my attention to the argument made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. The idea of the gentleman, if I understand his argument, is that there shall be no physical combination of plants. I call attention to the fact that that amendment would make this bill unworkable; that that amendment would make this bill lacking in economy and would make it burdensome to the consumer—a thing that the House does not want to do. In support of my contention I call to my aid the testimony taken in the hearings from some of the best water-power authorities who presented themselves before us. The first witness I call is Mr. L. B. Stillwell, one of the leading engineers of the United States, who appeared before the Committee on Public Lands. He says:

> Now, a physical connection with an adjacent line, I think, might be permitted * * * provided that the public is properly protected in order that there might be no increase in price.

Farther on he says:

> I think, as it is, the provision sufficiently protects the public in the matter of price. * * *

Why? Because this provision is supplemented by saying, first, that there shall be no combinations, arrangements, agreements, or understandings, express or implied, to limit the output of electrical energy; second, to restrain trade with foreign nations or between two or more States or within any one State; third, or to fix or maintain prices; and, fourth, to increase prices for electrical energy or service.

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I regret I can not. I have only a moment. Otherwise I would be glad to.

Again, Mr. P. P. Wells, of this city, a well-known authority on water power, who is the attorney for a well-known water-power company, says:

> With respect to consolidation, I think we are bound to have consolidation of water power. I do not think you can stop the consolidation of water power any more than you could stop the consolidation of railroads in the past.

Further, on page 200 of the hearings, Mr. Wells says:

> It would be desirable if it were properly controlled.

Let me read, again, what Dr. George Otis Smith says concerning a portion of the report of the public-utility water powers and their government regulation, Water-Supply Paper No. 238, in connection with this phase of the question. I read from the report:

> In the final analysis, therefore, all sources of power available for a particular field of demand must be brought under a common administration, so that at any time the energy can be turned hither and yon to meet the requirements of each hour. It follows that regulation prohibiting power monopoly must not prevent power consolidation, lest it injuriously affect industrial development. There is no virtue in preventing consolidation if economies in maintenance and operation are thereby prevented. No one will deny that water power consolidation secures distinct and unusual economies, and if the consumer receives the benefit therefrom he is better off under a consolidation. These are oft-stated and self-evident truths; therefore the proper solution of the problem must lie in the legislative regulation of water-power development and maintenance, to the end that the consumer shall pay a fair and reasonable price for power, consistent with the production of fair and reasonable earnings on the capital invested.

> I doubt if I would suggest an amendment of that language to any great extent. I should want to state that the natural monopoly which is described there can be absolutely beneficial to the consumer in the matter of decreasing cost, and also, what is equally important to the consumer, in increasing efficiency of service, reliability of service.

Now, what economy would it be to say that every house in this city must pay rent to two telephone companies in order that you might have supposed competition? What economy would it work if you had them pay rent to two electric light companies in this city instead of one? No one can contend that. The amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] would destroy the workability of this bill. It is not a friendly amendment offered in aid of this bill. It does not increase the efficiency of this bill. It is in the face of every authority on the subject. I can not believe that the friends of this bill who want to get, first, proper conservation; second, a bill that will work; and, third, a razor that will actually shave, will allow any such amendment as this to be adopted. Secretary Lane comes forward and says they have got to tie into each other in order to make a going concern of it, and that it not only does that but it works economies to the consumer. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming will not be agreed to. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 4, line 6, after the word "Secretary," strike out "but" and insert "and all leases and contracts shall be granted and entered into on the condition that."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, debate on this section and all amendments thereto was closed by unanimous consent on day before yesterday.

Mr. MONDELL. Following the words——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma makes the point of order that all debate on this section is closed.

Mr. MONDELL. I did not so understand it.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; it was.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman give me a couple of minutes?

Mr. FERRIS. I have no objection to the gentleman's proceeding for a couple of minutes by unanimous consent, but debate has been closed.

Mr. MONDELL. That is all I want.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Wyoming have two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the language following the words which I have inserted is in the nature of a general statute intended to prevent combination. The probability is that as a general statute it would not be at all effective as to plants within a State. My purpose is that the Federal Government shall use its ownership of these lands to do what it may properly do to strengthen the hands of the States in their control over these enterprises which are wholly within one State. The Government can do that. Its control over these lands does give it the power to make such a provision a part of the lease; but unless we do insert the words I have suggested, or some similar words, then the part of the following language that refers to an enterprise within a State is without force or effect, and, furthermore, the entire prohibition against combination is strengthened by making it a part of the contract, making the continuation of the lease dependent upon the observance of the prohibition against combination, both interstate and intrastate.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to add the words "of the Interior" after the word "Secretary," in line 6, page 4.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 6, after the word "Secretary," insert the words "of the Interior."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That except upon the written consent of the Secretary of the Interior no sale or delivery of power shall be made to a distributing company, except in case of an emergency and then only for a period not exceeding 30 days, nor shall any lease issued under this act be assignable or transferable without such written consent: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall preclude lessees from executing mortgages or trust deeds for the purpose of financing the project. Any successor or assign of such property or project, whether by voluntary transfer, judicial sale, foreclosure sale, or otherwise, shall be subject to all the conditions of the approval under which such rights are held, and also subject to all the provisions and conditions of this act to the same extent as though such successor or assign were the original lessee hereunder.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of section 4 down to and including the word "consent," in line 17.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, in lines 12 to 17, inclusive, strike out the following language: "That except upon the written consent of the Secretary of the Interior no sale or delivery of power shall be made to a distributing company, except in case of an emergency and then only for a period not exceeding 30 days, nor shall any lease issued under this act be assignable or transferable without such written consent."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the part of this section which I propose to strike out provides that there shall be no sale or delivery of power to a distributing company except on permission of the Secretary of the Interior. This is another one of the beautiful provisions of this act intended to make of all the public-land States Federal provinces. The entire bill is drafted upon the proposition that if a State is unlucky enough to have any of Uncle Sam's domains within its borders, it is not a State of the Union, it did not come into the Union with the same rights and on the same basis as other States, but it is a mere outlying Federal province, to be legislated for by gentlemen from the ends of the country, who know little of the conditions existing, and some of whom seem to have a limited knowledge of the fundamentals of the Government under which they are living. [Laughter.] For instance, in the State in which I live the people operate in the matter of water rights through what we know as a water board, and that board grants water rights for certain definite purposes. It may grant a water right for the purpose of furnishing power to a municipality. The company building the plant may not be so situated that it can enter into the business of distribution and, as a matter of fact, it could not distribute the water in the municipality. It would be compelled to treat the municipality as a distributing company.

Furthermore, there are many large plants selling electric energy generated by water, and there will be more in the future, whose organization is not such that they can go into the details of wide distribution, and there is no reason why they should. The people who use the current have no interest in that feature of the management. Their interest lies in securing the current at the lowest possible rate and under the most favorable conditions. This simply puts that much more power in the hands of the Secretary.

Of course it will be said that in all such cases the Secretary will say, "Why, of course; certainly; by my grace and under my grant," just as every kingling has said since time began. And here in this Republic, in this twentieth century, we are proposing to write into statute law provisions at which the bureaucrats of the Czar of all the Russias ought to halt and hesitate. The public-service corporations of the States can say whether or not it is in the public interest to have a power company deal with all its customers direct or through a distributing company. In many cases it is, I presume, necessary they should. I can not see why they should not. If there be any question let the State decide, and not compel the developers of power to go to the Secretary of the Interior and say, "Please may I, good Mr. Secretary."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, if I had as much antipathy to the Federal Government as the gentleman seems to have, I would move out of it—I would not even remain here. I prefer to be one of those who have respect for the Federal Government, each and every arm of it. I do not think it comes with good grace for any Representative in Congress to constantly rail and storm against his own Government. No one has a right to assume that the present Interior Department or that a future one will be made up of pickpockets and porch climbers. The Interior Department now, has been in the past, and will be in the future a patriotic, cogent force in this country to carry out the will of Congress and try to accomplish great good for the people. It is true that we give unusual powers to the Secretary of the Interior—and I recognize that this is very obnoxious to the gentleman from Wyoming—but the gentleman himself does not expect the House to follow him and allow water-power sites to be acquired by homesteaders, to allow oil and gas lands to be acquired by homesteaders at $1.25 an acre.

I am as liberal as the gentleman in allowing the western settler to acquire land for himself and family, but I do not agree with any part that the gentleman has said that it is our duty to allow the water power and oil and gas and coal and mineral lands in this country to slip into the hands of the few people, so that those few people can torture and oppress the rest. It is not right to the people, it is not right to the Federal Government, it is not what the gentleman ought to advocate, and it is not what he himself really means. It is the fashion in the West to teach the people to detest the Federal Government, and sooner or later the man who preaches that doctrine will reap the whirlwind that goes with it. The gentleman from Wyoming has been here too long to warrant him in taking the stand he does and calling the Government the Czar of Russia and vicious.

I do not believe the people exact any such tone from the gentleman, and I do not believe they will enjoy any such ranting and raving as that. Now, I speak dispassionately about it and not in any spirit of partisanship. I do not believe any good Republican, any good Progressive, or any good Democrat will advocate or approve any such doctrine.

Now, one word about the amendment. The amendment strikes out the backbone of this section, and, if adopted, would leave two wild, meaningless provisos. It could not have been offered in good faith, or otherwise the gentleman would have moved to strike out the two provisos. I should not think that the gentleman from Wyoming would want to vote for the amendment himself. I ask for a vote.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask that at the expiration of five minutes, which will be occupied by the gentleman from Wisconsin, all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. CLINE. I object to that.

Mr. FERRIS. It is only on this amendment and amendments to the amendment.

Mr. CLINE. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to a report made by the United States consul at Berlin, Robert P. Skinner, printed in the Consular and Trade Report of August 17, the present month, on hydroelectric development in Germany. It contains some very interesting facts. He says:

The works at Rheinfelden were begun 15 years earlier. The company has a capital of 12,000,000 marks ($2,856,000). This enterprise is the result of a common effort between the German concern and the Swiss Canton of Basel City. The cantonal authorities first proposed to build independent works 6½ miles above Basel, where there is a fall in the Rhine of 16½ feet. Eventually the German and Swiss interests were consolidated and the Kraftübertragungs-Werke Rheinfelden, A.-G., obtained the concession.

Before the German and Swiss interests were fused there was a prolonged discussion of the subject, participated in by the Grand-Duchy of Baden and the Swiss Cantons of Argau, Basel City, and Basel Land, and the principal point discussed was the advisability of giving over the concession to a private corporation. The Canton of Basel City reserved the right to be represented in the board of managers of the corporation and in the financial management, and provided for the interests of future users of current. The profits of the concern are limited by the terms of the concession, and should they be exceeded, consumers are entitled to a reduction in rates. During the fiscal year 1913 the company's net earnings were 1,055,993.40 marks ($251,326), and it paid a regular dividend of 8 per cent and a superdividend of 4 per cent out of the available surplus.

The Kraftübertragungs-Werke Rheinfelden, A.-G., furnishes energy directly to a population of about 56,000 inhabitants. In addition to this direct service a large amount of energy is delivered to middle organizations, societies, and overland power works, which dispose of the same to their members or consumers. The current is furnished at a tension of 130, 220, and 500 volts, or at a high tension of 6,800 volts or more. The following are the prices per year and per lamp paid by consumers for electric current:

Carbon lamps.	First category.	Second category.
10 candlepower	$1.26	$2.28
16 candlepower	1.90	3.80
25 candlepower	3.09	5.71
Metal filament lamps per candlepower	.057	.095

The "first category" includes lamps in bedrooms, drawing-rooms, cellars, stables, and warehouses; the "second category" includes living rooms, kitchens, passages, offices, and workshops.

Prices for a 500-volt current for industrial purposes are quoted per kilowatt hour as follows: For the first 10,000 kilowatt hours, $0.0214; 10,001 to 20,000 kilowatt hours, $0.019; 20,001 to 30,000 kilowatt hours, $0.0166; 30,001 to 50,000 kilowatt hours, $0.0142; 50,001 to 80,000 kilowatt hours, $0.0119; 80,001 to 120,000 kilowatt hours, $0.0107; 120,001 to 150,000 kilowatt hours, $0.0099; 150,001 and more kilowatt hours, $0.0095.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Is the gentleman familiar with the statement recently made by the association composed of electrical power and lighting engineers of the country, to the effect that the cost of electric energy for power and light in this country during the past few years has shown a reduction of somewhere like 17 per cent, and that it is one of the few industries that has given the consumer a lessening of cost in the power furnished, so that we are not confronted in this country by the spectacle of increasing cost in electrical energy and electrical force?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. About 10 seconds.

Mr. COOPER. I yield back the balance of my time. [Laughter.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may be allowed five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Wisconsin may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. I am willing that the gentleman from Wisconsin should have five minutes additional, but at the end of that time I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I called attention to this report by our consul merely to show the way that the consumers of hydroelectric power and light in Germany are protected against wrongful exactions. In this particular instance the profits of the concern are limited by law, and rates to consumers are low.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the gentleman any knowledge as to what the rates are in this country for power generated by coal and also hydroelectric power for the respective units as stated in the bulletin from which he has just read?

Mr. COOPER. No. I know something was said here a while ago about a reduction from 16 to 12 cents per kilowatt hour. I think the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] called attention to that.

Mr. BRYAN. We pay 10 cents here in Washington.

Mr. STAFFORD. In many other cities the rates are much lower than that.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I have heard repeated reference here to what the United States has done, and to what States have done, in the past in the matter of regulating the building of dams and the use of water power. Now, before we cite a precedent we ought to know the facts out of which the precedent arose. The so-called "precedents," the laws which have heretofore controlled the building of dams and the use of water-power privileges, were based upon facts entirely unlike the facts of to-day. The "precedents" to which gentlemen refer, and the original laws regulating the building of dams and the use of water power, were made at a time when the use of electricity for power purposes was unknown; when a man who wanted to use water power at a dam site was obliged to put his mill beside the dam. But to-day the man who owns a dam can carry electric power from it to his factory or mill 300 miles away.

A great dam in the center of Wisconsin might now generate power that could be carried east across the State to Lake Michigan and west across the State into Minnesota. It is impossible to find any analogy between such conditions, and the laws properly applicable to them, and the conditions and laws of 50 or more years ago, when a dam could not generate power that could be used away from the dam itself.

You might as well expect the men who made the so-called "precedents" to which the gentlemen have appealed, the precedents of 50 or 60 or 100 years ago, to have made laws to govern the use of aeroplanes. They knew nothing of aeroplanes. They knew nothing of the use of electricity for power purposes and its tremendous possibilities. They were not omniscient. They made laws for conditions as they saw them; and those laws and conditions constituted precedents—usually just precedents—down to the time that conditions remained unchanged. But now that conditions have changed so utterly, neither the old laws nor the acts done under them can properly be cited as precedents to control us in our efforts to help solve this new and vastly important problem—the problem of enacting wise laws to control the generation and distribution of hydroelectric power. Experts declare that there is a possibility of developing in the United States more than 35,000,000 of hydroelectric horsepower. An uncontrolled monopoly of this enormous power would give men such an opportunity to tyrannize over business as the world has never before seen or imagined.

If a few men were to secure control of the water powers of the country, they could control the industries of the country. Never was this possibility brought home to the American people until within very recent years. We can not meet this new situation by appealing to the laws and practices of 50 years ago. The man who now runs a factory by electric power brought from his milldam 300 miles away is, in a business sense, a very different individual from the man who 100 years ago owned the same dam, when it could generate only water power and when, in order to use that water power, he must build his factory or mill close beside the dam.

Mr. Chairman, in considering questions of interstate commerce, State lines should be no more than county lines. This bill relates to water powers on the public lands, and presents a great national question that can not be answered by appeals to State prejudice.

We all wish to see an early and thorough development of the country's hydroelectric power resources under laws and on conditions just to all. In urging such development we touch upon a subject of great national importance, for the possession and control of the hydroelectric power of the United States would mean the control of the industries of the United States. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 18, after the word "however," strike out the following: "That nothing herein contained shall preclude lessees from executing mortgages or trust deeds for the purpose of financing the project."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That no lessee under this act shall create any lien upon any power project developed under a permit issued under this act by a mortgage or trust deed, except approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and for the bona fide purpose of financing the business of the lessee."

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I am offering this amendment for the purpose of harmonizing this particular portion of this section with the provisions of section 3, which has just been perfected by the committee. Section 3 provides that in the issue of bonds and securities it can only be done by approval of the Secretary of the Interior. I believe the same regulation ought to exist with reference to deeds and mortgages executed and created as a lien on the property; that the Secretary of the Interior ought to be authorized and directed to scrutinize the purpose for which mortgages and trust deeds are executed upon the property that he is operating. And for this reason: This section 3 provides that the Secretary of the Interior, under certain conditions, may control the rates at which hydroelectric power is sold. If that be true, then the committee ought to go further and say that the Secretary of the Interior should have the right to fix the basis on which those rates are fixed. It is well recognized that this is an avenue through which, very frequently, corporations seek to increase the price to the consumer of the product they have to sell. There can be no harm in subjecting these propositions to the Secretary of the Interior for his examination and approval before liens are created upon property of this character, and it ought to be done for another reason. My friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] states, which is a well known fact to everybody, that electricity can be carried to the extent of 300 miles as an operating power for plants and industrial institutions.

If that be so, a man living at a distance of 300 miles ought to rely upon the same authority that has the power and whose duty it is to fix the basis for the rate that he has to pay. Now, we are lodging all this power in the Secretary of the Interior. Why should not we say that a trust deed executed or a mortgage executed upon the property shall be for the bona fide financing of the business that he is engaged in and not for the purpose of securing some stockholder or some individual who may have advanced some money? It looks to me as though this provision is in direct harmony with the provision set forth in the bill in section 3, and I offer the amendment believing the committee will not feel that any wrong is done to any stockholder or any company, or that the discretion this bill vests in the Secretary of the Interior is in the least curtailed by protecting the rights of the users.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the original question presented by the gentleman's amendment was presented to the committee and just why the language was stricken out I can not remember now. We had in it this: "Except by mortgage issued for the bona fide purpose for financing the business to any transferee not having the capacity to lease defined thereunder." This is intended to cover the same question. Now, as I read the provisions of this bill that the gentleman moves to strike out:

That nothing herein contained shall preclude lessees from executing mortgages or trust deeds for the purpose of financing the project.

Now, the gentleman's amendment reads:

That no lessee under this act shall create any lien upon any power project developed under the permit issued under this act or mortgage or trust deed, except approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and for the bona fide purpose of financing the business of the lease.

I suppose it is the intention of the committee to carry out the same view the gentleman has in his amendment, but the wording is a little different.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAKER. Surely.

Mr. CLINE. The original paragraph was that no mortgage should be executed except for the financing of the business, but who is to determine under the original language, who is to decide whether it is necessary for the financing of the business? Why not put this power in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior to determine that a mortgage or trust deed is necessary to finance an institution, if its financial condition is such that it is necessary to execute a mortgage or trust deed? Then you locate the responsibility of executing the mortgage or trust deed in the Secretary of the Interior, where you place all the other elements in reference to regulation.

Mr. RAKER. The only trouble will be that in a great many of the States the public-utility commission law authorizes who shall construct them and control these concerns and before any mortgage can be made or any indebtedness incurred they must make their application and show what the property is and what the money is to be used for, and they must use it for that purpose, and unquestionably in many States I do not know how it would be, but I know this company in California would have to go to the public-utilities commission to raise the money and would have to spend it for that purpose, and the only question in my mind is whether or not we ought to be writing all the provisions of a statute in a general bill. The gentleman's proposition undoubtedly is all right.

Mr. CLINE. I was at a loss to understand why the committee in directing that all stocks and bonds should be under the strict supervision of the Secretary of the Interior in their issuances did not also include mortgages and trust deeds, inasmuch as they are all liens upon the property. You submit one for his inspection and approval, why not the other?

Mr. RAKER. Well, it says here that they are not permitted to issue a lien or a mortgage on the property for any purpose except financing the project. That is clearly the intent of the bill. Does not the gentleman think so?

Mr. CLINE. But upon whose authority; who is to determine that the necessities exist? The only referee that ought to be recognized as to that proposition ought to be the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. RAKER. Suppose that a company should issue a mortgage for $100,000 for the purpose of buying some other property? Clearly a mortgage would be illegal under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. CLINE. Well, I do not know. I do not understand how the lessee ought to be permitted to issue a double lien of that kind when there is no inspection required.

Mr. RAKER. That is one of the conditions provided for. If he violates it, he is deprived of his franchise. Now, the bill says:

That nothing herein contained shall preclude lessees executing mortgages or trust deeds for the purpose of financing the project.

Now, if they place a mortgage or a lien upon the property for another purpose that is contrary to the provisions of this bill, that is contrary to the rules and regulations to be placed on it by the Secretary of the Interior, and it will be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior upon ascertaining that fact to declare the lease forfeited.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may have two minutes additional in order to interrogate gentlemen representing the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CLINE. The distinction between the gentleman's illustration and this situation is this: When there is no authority to say whether a deed or mortgage should be executed or not the mortgagee is protected, and the mortgagee is not required to follow the use of the money into the financing of the plant. When there is inspection and authorization by the Secretary of the Interior the general public is protected as well as the mortgagee, and that is the purpose of regulation.

Mr. RAKER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to that——

Mr. CLINE. Where the authority is vested in the Secretary of the Interior, not only is the mortgagee protected under those circumstances, but, what is of more importance, the men who use the electricity at so much per kilowatt hour are protected.

Mr. RAKER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to section 11, which covers the very thing, and which we are not very far apart on:

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to examine books and accounts of lessees, and to require them to submit statements, representations, or reports, including information as to cost of water rights, lands, easements, and other property acquired, production, use, distribution, and sale of energy, all of which statements, representations, or reports so required shall be upon oath, unless otherwise specified, and in such form and upon such blanks as the Secretary of the Interior may require; and any person making any false statement, representation, or report under oath shall be subject to punishment as for perjury.

Now, that covers the entire business of the concern.

Mr. CLINE. The gentleman understands that that is not in connection with creating any lien upon the property. That is only to give the Secretary of the Interior general information as to what the company or organization has already done, and has no reference whatever to the present necessity of the lessee for financing his institution by creating any Lien upon it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAGE of North Carolina). The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] has expired.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Indiana is a good one, and that the idea expressed in that amendment is in accord with the idea expressed by the language which the committee used; but the language suggested by the gentleman from Indiana makes it a little more sure, as it should do. I think the gentleman who has offered this amendment struck the matter squarely on the head when he asked the gentleman from California who was to determine what the purpose of the mortgage was. Under the language of the bill the company might well determine the purpose and might properly be considered as having the final word on that proposition. Under the amendment the Secretary of the Interior would determine what the purpose of the mortgage was. In one case it would be the company itself determining the question for itself and in the other case it would be the representative of the consuming public determining what the purpose was. The bill states that a company may mortgage or execute a trust deed for the purpose of financing the project. Now, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks whether it would not be true that if a company attempted to put a mortgage on their plant for the purpose of acquiring additional plant capacity, that mortgage would be illegal. If that proposition ever got into court it would be a pretty close question as to whether or not that mortgage was illegal. It might be very well contended by the representatives of the company that with the plant of its original size it was impossible to finance it; and in order to finance it they had to acquire additional plant capacity, and that they were doing that in executing this mortgage. That might be very plausible, but it might be very untrue. A water-power concern might have a great desire to give some rival a claim on it, and they might work that out by executing a mortgage which would purport on its face to be a mortgage for the purpose of financing the project, but really would be something else. It might be that a concern felt it was not getting quite the return it ought to get on its product, and it might want to bolster up its accounts so as to justify an increase in rates. They might attempt to do that in an ingenious sort of a way by putting on a mortgage that they might claim was for the purpose of financing their plant, but it would be for a very different purpose. As I said in the beginning, there is no conflict in the language suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana and the language that is in the original section as suggested by the committee, but the language of the amendment makes it surer and protects the interests of the consumer in the proposition involved. It seems to me it would be well to adopt the amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I shall consume only a minute. I know that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] offered his amendment with the very best of purpose, and I am not sure but it may improve the text. It was the opinion of the committee that at the initial outset of the water-power development the developer ought to have money and get his assets together, so that we might not be subject to the charge that we are affording the country a razor that will not shave and a bill that will not accomplish things. And that is the only thing we had in mind in letting the borrower have a little more of a free hand than the gentleman's amendment would let him have. And the text as it stands says that the money must be for development purposes, and I believe that there would not be any judge of the proposition as satisfactory as would be the Secretary of the Interior.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MONDELL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes none.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] offered the amendment he did, because I had a similar amendment drawn, but had I offered it the gentlemen on the other side would have all opposed it, and we could not have carried it. As it was offered by a Democrat, we carried it largely with Republican votes on this side.

Mr. Chairman, it is a little bit tiresome when one in the best of faith makes an observation with regard to a bill of this kind, and a gentleman on the other side spends 4 minutes and 55 seconds of his time in misstating one's position, and the balance of the time discussing something other than the amendment. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] does not disturb me by suggesting that I am hostile to the Federal Government. The gentleman knows better than that. I love the Federal Government so well that I want to perpetuate it, and I am old-fashioned enough to think that you can not perpetuate it unless you maintain the balance of power between the States, or the people in the States, and the Federal Government. In other words, I am one of those people old-fashioned enough to believe that if this Government is going to be maintained it must be maintained under the Constitution we now have, and I am not one of those who believe that State lines have become even as county lines, and I am not one of those who believe that the people in the States of this Union are so miserably pusillanimous that they will not protect themselves. Also, I am not one of those who believe that the State of Wisconsin, for instance, does not protect its citizens as well as do the Cantons of Switzerland. By the way, the gentleman was discussing the question of water power over there in Switzerland. Did anyone take note of the fact that it was the Grand Duchy of Baden and the Cantons of Switzerland that were doing it? It was not the Empire of Germany, or even the Federation of Switzerland, small as it is.

It was the people locally exercising their powers and protecting themselves. I have not reached the point when I believe you put into the hands of a single man—the Secretary of the Interior, whoever he may be—all the powers under our Constitution which the people have reserved unto themselves in order to protect the people.

Another thing: The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], arguing as many a pettifogger has argued—although he is not a pettifogger, but a good lawyer, and therefore he ought not to argue in that way—instead of attempting to answer any argument made, proceeds to misstate the position of the fellow on the other side. He knows that I am no more in favor of turning over water powers to anyone improperly than he is. He knows that I am no more in favor of having anyone monopolize the water powers or the coal lands than he; but he is simply adopting the method of the pettifogger and the method of the cuttlefish when, failing to discuss the point at issue, he proceeds to misstate my position in the matter.

Why, if we had not with votes on this side compelled them to adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] they would not have adopted that amendment, which gives the Secretary of the Interior the authority he ought to have. When I offered an amendment a moment ago that would strengthen the hands of the States and strengthen the hands of the Federal Government in controlling water-power development they turned it down. And why? Because it was not written in the bill as the Secretary handed it to the committee and as the committee finally worked it over somewhat under departmental guidance.

Now, I do not like the provisions of this bill, because I think they lead to monopoly, because there is not a line in the bill that will have any tendency to prevent concentration. On the contrary, its effect will be to accelerate concentration. It takes authority from the people in the States and gives it to the Secretary of the Interior. I believe the people have the right to control and that they will control more wisely than the Secretary can.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PAGE of North Carolina). The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming and myself have both frequently departed somewhat in our discussions from the beaten paths in our zeal to carry out the things we believe in, and in what I said I had no intention whatever to impugn the statements or abuse the position assumed by the gentleman from Wyoming. It would be impossible for me to hold the gentleman from Wyoming up to disfavor for a moment. It would be impossible to do that, I say, on my part; but the gentleman from Wyoming is so clear in presenting his own views, and does present them so frequently, that if I should attempt to misrepresent him he would correct me, and the RECORD would thereby be made complete.

Mr. Chairman, as there is nothing before the House, I ask that the Clerk proceed with the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That upon not less than three years' notice prior to the expiration of any lease under this act the United States shall have the right to take over the properties which are dependent, in whole or in part, for their usefulness on the continuance of the lease herein provided for, and which may have been acquired by any lessee acting under the provisions of this act, upon condition that it shall pay, before taking possession, first, the actual costs of rights of way, water rights, lands, and interests therein purchased and used by the lessee in the generation and distribution of electrical energy under the lease, and, second, the reasonable value of all other property taken over, including structures and fixtures acquired, erected, or placed upon the lands and included in the generation or distribution plant, and which are dependent as hereinabove set forth, such reasonable value to be determined by mutual agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the lessee, and, in case they can not agree, by proceedings instituted in the United States circuit court for that purpose: Provided, That such reasonable value shall not include or be affected by the value of the franchise or good will or profits to be earned on pending contracts or any other intangible element.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 4, before the word "prior," insert "which may be issued at any time after three years immediately."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I assume that it was the intent of the committee that the Federal Government could only exercise the right contemplated in section 5 at the expiration of the lease. Is that correct? I will ask the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the language will bear a very different construction; that under an entirely reasonable construction of this language I think the Federal Government could issue this notice three years after the lease was granted, or practically at any time after the lease was granted. If the intent is that the Federal Government shall not have the right to issue this notice except practically at the expiration of the lease, or at any time thereafter, then some such language as I have suggested will be necessary.

Mr. RAKER. Does not the gentleman think he is a little hypercritical?

Mr. MONDELL. No; I think not, for this reason: Allow me to say to the gentleman that half a dozen people, looking at this bill at different angles, independent of mine, have expressed views similar to mine relative to that matter.

My only object here is to do what I assume to be the intent of the Committee—not to interfere with the lease during its term, but to give the Federal Government the right to issue this three-year notice, so that at the end of the lease the Government can exercise its right, or at any time thereafter. I think the language I sent up does that.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee will agree to this amendment. The language of the bill is that "upon not less than three years' notice prior to the expiration of any lease the Government shall have the right to take over the property." I made a note on this bill to the effect that "any time probably means at the end of the term. It is very loosely drawn. There is no provision after the end of the lease."

Now, plainly it is not intended—or if intended, it ought not to be intended—to permit the Government to serve a notice immediately when the lease is granted to take over the property, unless it proposed to pay the promotion charges, at least. But this says, "upon not less than three years' notice prior to the expiration of the lease." Now, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming would fix it so that that notice may be given at any time after three years immediately prior to the expiration of the lease, so that, in the first place, you would not have the Government take over the property until the end of the lease, but you could have the Government take over the property at any time after the end of the lease. This makes no provision under the terms of the bill, even as the gentleman from California construes it—and I think he takes a forced construction—for taking over the property. Under that there is no provision after the expiration of the lease for the Government to take the property.

Mr. RAKER. The purpose of this language is that at any time; that is, immediately—that is what it intends to mean—before the expiration of the lease, upon three years' notice, the Government may take over this plant.

Mr. MANN. Now, the gentleman means, I take it, that the Government should have the right, three years prior to the expiration of the lease, to give notice that it will take it at the end of the term?

Mr. RAKER. That is it exactly.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I agree with my colleague from Illinois that the language used here needs some change. I am not sure, however, that the language suggested by the gentleman from Wyoming ought to go in there. I want to ask the gentleman what he thinks of this language, "That upon not less than three years' notice the United States shall have the right, at the expiration of the lease or at any time thereafter, to take over the property." Does not that come nearer expressing what the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Wyoming had in mind?

Mr. MANN. I am like my colleague; he probably does not carry the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming in his head, and I do not carry his proposition in my mind. The amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming will be this: It will make the first time that you can give the notice three years before the end of the lease, and authorizes a notice at any time, even after that, or after the expiration of the lease.

I take it that that is what is desired. The amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] quite clearly covers that and nothing more. It might be well to have it reported again.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. As the amendment was reported by the Clerk, it would seem to me——

Mr. MANN. Let me read the amendment. This is the way it will read if amended, and that is the way to get it:

That upon not less than three years' notice, which may be issued at any time after three years immediately prior to the expiration of any lease under this act.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. It seems to me that that is a little awkward in its expression, and it would be more straightforward if it should say that upon not less than three years' notice the United States shall have the right, at the expiration of the lease or at any time thereafter, to take over the property. That insures three years' notice, and it provides that it shall be done at the expiration of the lease or at any time thereafter.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly. That would require several amendments to the bill. The language of my colleague [Mr. MONDELL] would cover the case entirely. This states it plainly—that upon notice, which may be issued at any time after three years immediately prior to the expiration of the lease, the Government may take over the property.

Mr. RUCKER. Does that mean at any time after the beginning of the three-year period?

Mr. MANN. The three years' notice can not be served until three years immediately prior to the expiration of the lease, and after that you can give three years' notice and take over the property at any time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a little more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. I call the attention of the gentleman to the particular language, "at any time after three years."

Mr. MANN. No; it says upon not less than three years' notice, which—the word "notice" not being repeated—may be issued at any time after three years immediately prior to the expiration of the lease.

Mr. RUCKER. The notice may be at any time after the expiration of three years immediately before the expiration of the lease.

Mr. MANN. Notice can be given at any time after three years, just before the expiration of the lease. In other words, if the lease is for 50 years, under this provision you can give the notice at the end of the forty-seventh year, or at any time thereafter.

Mr. COOPER. Would not the insertion of the word "next" after the word "notice" make it clearer?

Mr. MANN. That would not cover the issuing of a notice that affected the right to purchase the property after the expiration of the lease. When I first made a notation upon this I proposed to insert merely the word "immediately" before the word "notice," so that there would be three years' notice immediately prior to the expiration of the lease; but I think the Government should retain the right to give notice, even after the notice has expired, if it does not lease the property to somebody else; and the next section gives the right to lease it to somebody else. We do not want to fix it so that the Government must serve the notice on a particular day and then have its right end on that day.

Mr. FERRIS. Is it the contention of the gentleman that the section as it now stands would enable the Secretary of the Interior to serve the three years' notice at any time during the life of the lease?

Mr. MANN. Yes; that is one contention; second, that it would not enable him to serve notice or take the property after the expiration of the lease.

Mr. FERRIS. Has the gentleman given careful attention to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], and does he think it accomplishes what is desired?

Mr. MANN. I think so.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think the committee wants to dispute with the gentleman about that at all.

Mr. MANN. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming covers the case absolutely.

Mr. RAKER. Let the Clerk report it again.

Mr. MANN. Let me read it:

That upon not less than three years' notice, which may be issued at any time after three years immediately prior to the expiration of any lease under this act—

The United States shall have the right to take the property.

Mr. RAKER. This is intended to give the party three years' notice.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Now, let us see. As I understand the reading of it, then it adds to the word "prior" the words "which may be issued at any time after three years prior to the expiration of the lease."

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. You could not get the three years in there.

Mr. MANN. Why, certainly.

Mr. RAKER. I do not know but what that covers three years before the expiration of the lease as well as afterwards. In other words, the Government gives this notice three years before the lease expires.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Or at any time afterwards.

Mr. MANN. If it does not give it then, it can give it afterwards.

Mr. RAKER. I think that is the way it ought to be. I think that is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. COOPER. I ask that it be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 4, before the word "prior," insert "which may be issued at any time after three years immediately," so that the paragraph as amended will read:

"That upon not less than three years' notice, which may be issued at any time after three years immediately prior to the expiration of any lease under this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word merely for the purpose of saying that I trust our friend from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] is not losing sight of the fact that an amendment which he has just suggested was agreed to without a dissenting voice.

Mr. MONDELL. I am delighted, and I hope other amendments will be adopted in the same way.

Mr. MANN. I can suggest to the gentleman an amendment which will be adopted without a dissenting vote, if he will offer it.

Mr. RAKER. I offer the following amendment, in line 21, page 5, to strike out the word "circuit" and insert the word "district."

Mr. MANN. I was just going to ask the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to offer that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. RAKER:
Page 5, line 21, strike out the word "circuit" and insert the word "district."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should move to strike out this section if it were not for the fact that if any bill of this sort is to be adopted some provision of this kind must, of course, be in the bill. But I want to make a suggestion in regard to this entire matter of recapture. I am not disturbed in regard to recapture from the standpoint of those who may invest in power plants. I think that in all probability capital can be secured in the majority of cases for plants that may be worthy of development on a 50-year lease. I doubt if the 50-year lease will greatly discourage investment in the majority of cases of itself; but I do believe as thoroughly and profoundly as I ever believed anything that there is no public interest to be served by any provision of recapture. I believe, on the contrary, that the tendency and effect of a provision of that kind is to increase the cost of power; increase the cost of the energy delivered.

Fifty years is better than twenty-five, and twenty-five is better than ten, but one hundred years would be better than fifty, and an indeterminate period better than all, for this reason: It makes no difference to the people of the country whether it is Bill Smith or Joe Brown who controls and owns the water power, or who the stockholders are. The people's interest is twofold: First, to secure the benefit of the energy developed at the least price under the most favorable conditions; and second, in order that that may be accomplished, to completely control the enterprise at all times with regard to all of its activities.

Cheapness is secured under public control after consideration of the elements of cost, and one of the elements of cost of an enterprise is the cost of amortizing the enterprise. If it is an enterprise in perpetuity, to go on indefinitely, there is no excuse for amortization. On the contrary, if it be based on a 50-year lease there is at least a very excellent argument on behalf of those who invest that it is their right to secure all or a large portion of the capital cost of the enterprise within the period of the lease in addition to a return on the investment in the way of interest.

So I believe that any provision of this kind is not in the interest of the public, not in the interest of the people generally, but that it does tend and will tend to increase the cost of power. The right to buy under certain conditions does not, after all, greatly modify the present power of the public in a matter of this sort, and particularly in those public-land States where the use of water is a public use and where the right of eminent domain may be exercised—where there is a higher public use to be served than the one for which the enterprise is being operated.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. COOPER. Does the gentleman say that it is his judgment that those who invest in an enterprise of this kind ought, before the expiration of the 50-year lease, to get some of the investment on the original cost? They get that back at the end of the 50 years.

Mr. MONDELL. That is a question under the provisions of this bill. The bill provides that they shall get back the actual cost of water rights and of lands—that they shall get back the fair value, whatever that may be, of their other property. In other words, as to the property that might appreciate in value during the term of the lease they can secure none of the increased value.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks that the time of the gentleman from Wyoming may be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Reserving the right to object, I ask that at the expiration of the gentleman's remarks all debate on this amendment be closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that at the expiration of the remarks of the gentleman from Wyoming all debate on the section shall be closed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. As to the property such as lands and water rights, which would naturally increase in value, when the property is taken over the company or individual owning the property can secure no part of that increase. It must be turned over to the Federal Government at what it originally cost. But when you come to that class of property that constantly and continually rapidly depreciates after construction—buildings, pipe lines, dynamos, and all that sort of thing—the bill provides that they shall be taken over, not at their cost but at their reasonable value at the time they are taken over.

Now, there is a depreciation decreed in the bill, and that being true any court passing on the question of rates, or any public commission fixing rates, would be compelled to recognize that here was an uncertainty as to the return of capital invested at the end of the lease, and that therefore, whatever that uncertainty measured, be it less or more, would be a matter of judgment, and the owners would be perfectly justified in providing a scheme for amortizing that value before the expiration of the lease.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. CLINE. Suppose in the development of electricity it is found that new machinery is necessary in order to get the best available returns, would not the cost of that new machinery have to be deducted in the final settlement, and would not they get the pay for it?

Mr. MONDELL. They would get the value of the machinery in use but not its original value. Now, I am not especially quarreling with these provisions. I do not think they are wise even if you make the provision for a terminate of the lease; I think they tend to make the current cost more.

Mr. CLINE. Ought not those people who are compelled to put in new machinery in order to get better results have that cost included when they come to final settlement?

Mr. MONDELL. I think if we are to take over the property—recapture it, as they say—at the end of 50 years, or at any time, we should take it over at its actual and fair value. I think in the long run you would get cheaper service under a provision of that kind than under the provisions of this bill. I think the service would be still cheaper if there was no definite termination of the lease. I have my doubts also whether you can recapture the property as suggested—whether the Government has power to do it. We must realize that public service corporations or courts must take into consideration the fact that you can not confiscate a man's property. You can make the returns so low that they may be very small, but you can not confiscate a man's property, and therefore anticipating losses, which would be inevitable under the provisions of recapture in this bill, the rate would be fixed so as to cover that, as well as interest. Do I answer the gentleman's question?

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I was asking my question in the light of the language in the bill here, which seems to me ought to provide for the full return of the investment if there is to be an amortization proposition.

Mr. MONDELL. I think we must do one of two things. If we pay the full value of the property at the end of the term, then there would not be any argument for amortization, but, so long as we do not provide that, there is an argument for it, and that is a claim that the courts or public-service commissions would consider in fixing rates.

Mr. COPLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. COPLEY. Does the gentleman realize what percentage of the property which needs to be provided for in amortization must be set aside every six months, in order that compounding at 5 per cent semiannually it will completely amortize the property at the end of 50 years?

Mr. MONDELL. I am not familiar with that.

Mr. COPLEY. Six-tenths of 1 per cent a year will be more than enough.

Mr. MONDELL. To provide for amortization?

Mr. COPLEY. For complete amortization at the end of 50 years you need to set aside every six months less than three-tenths of 1 per cent, and compound it semiannually at 5 per cent.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is better posted in regard to these matters than I am, but I want to say that when I was home last fall I talked with a friend of mine who had a small electric plant, and he told me that his plant had to be paid for in 10 years, that every 10 years his plant wore out.

Mr. COPLEY. That is a very different matter. That is an operating expense.

Mr. MONDELL. It would be in the nature of an operating expense if the operation were continuous, but not if there comes a time when the plant is to be taken over under the terms of this bill.

Mr. COPLEY. That is not amortization. That is depreciation incident to the business.

Mr. MONDELL. If the enterprise was a continuing one, going on forever, then you care for betterments and improvements in your charge, but if at the end of a certain period, in addition to that charge for betterments and improvements, carried right along, there must be some provision made for loss in actual investment values, then it must be an addition in the nature of amortization.

Mr. COPLEY. Amortization in 50 years is at the rate of less than six-tenths of 1 per cent a year, one-half set aside every six months and compounded semiannually.

Mr. MANN. At what rate of interest?

Mr. COPLEY. Five per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That in the event the United States does not exercise its right to take over, maintain, and operate the properties as provided in section 5 hereof, or does not renew the lease to the original lessee upon such terms and conditions and for such periods as may be authorized under the then existing applicable laws, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized, upon the expiration of any lease under this act, to lease the properties of the original lessee to a new lessee upon such terms, under such conditions, and for such periods as applicable laws may then authorize, and upon the further condition that the new lessee shall pay for the properties as provided in section 5 of this act.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have never been able to clearly understand—and it is probably my fault—what is really meant by section 6. Section 5 provides for the taking over of the property by the Federal Government. Section 6 provides that if the Federal Government does not take the property over and does not renew the lease it may turn over the property owned by the lessee, I assume, on any terms the Secretary sees fit and lease them to some one else. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] shakes his head. Is it the gentleman's idea that if the Secretary is going to take the property over with a view of leasing to some one else the other lessee shall pay for the property upon the same basis as is provided for in section 5?

Mr. FERRIS. Precisely, and we think the section so provides.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, that being true, let me make this suggestion: Let us take it for granted that from the standpoint of the public interest you may be justified in taking over or you may have authority to take over a man's property at the end of a lease for the use of all of the people, not at what it is worth, not at a fair price, but at what it cost 50 years before. To me that is a startling proposition. I grant you that I am old-fashioned, and I do somewhat cling to precedents, and if that be a crime I am guilty. There are certain precedents that you can not overturn until you overturn the eternal verities. There are certain things that are founded on truths. They may be obscured, they may be temporarily brushed aside for a time, they may be trampled under foot, but a great man said years ago that crushed to earth they rise again, and these old precedents with regard to taking people's property are based on verities eternal in character.

Assuming that you may modify the eternal verities as we have understood them with regard to taking a man's property without due compensation because you have made a contract with him under which he has waived all of his natural and legal rights—assuming that that is true, and that you can do that in the interest of the public, query, Can you do it in behalf of some favorite of the Secretary of the Interior? Ought you to do it in behalf of some favorite of the Secretary of the Interior? Even assuming that the Government ought to have the right to take the property over and use it under section 5, should the Secretary of the Interior have the right to take it over under those conditions—confiscatory, as we have been accustomed to understand those things—and hand the property over to some one who had nothing to do with it up to that moment, some one who has had none of the worry or none of the trouble of getting the property in shape; of starting it and nursing it; of developing it through all of the 50 years; some one new to the scene—turn over the property that has been developed at great expenditure of time and energy and thought and care to other people and let them, without payment, become the proprietors of the unearned increment—if that is what it is—which you have ruthlessly taken from the men who really created it?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I do not understand that there is even a suggestion of taking the property away from a company by the Government, either for its own, to be operated by it, or to be given over to somebody else, until the original owner says that he no longer wants it.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I suggest to him that he read the bill, because if the gentleman has any such notion as that he does not read the bill the way I read it. The Secretary can take it over when he pleases—when he gets ready—any minute after the expiration of the lease.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman be kind enough to state what the conditions would be under which the Government would want the property back?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, the Lord only knows.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. And if at any time the Government gives the three years' notice, is it compelled to take the property if it should find the property run down so as to be worthless?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman propounds conundrums here that nobody can answer, unless it is the gentlemen in charge of the bill, and I do not think they can. There is certainly nothing in the bill itself which would compel the Federal Government ever to take the property over, although it might be issuing these notices all the time continually and every day in the year. It would not be compelled to take the property over if it did not want to.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Even after notice was given?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no; I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That where, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, the public interest requires or justifies the execution by any lessee of contracts for the sale and delivery of electrical energy for periods extending beyond the life of the lease, such contracts may be entered into upon the approval of the said Secretary, and thereafter, in the event of the exercise by the United States of the option to take over the plant in the manner provided in sections 5 or 6 hereof, the United States or its new lessee shall assume and fulfill all such contracts entered into by the first lessee.

Mr. STAFFORD. I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 6, line 17, after the word "lease," by inserting the words "but for not more than 20 years thereafter."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is a good one, and I do not think there will be any objection on the part of the committee, and certainly not on my part.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Let us see about this. I suppose the proposed amendment means not more than 20 years after the expiration of the lease?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes. I was debating whether the amendment should go in after the word "lease" or after the word "Secretary." I did have an amendment prepared after the word "Secretary."

Mr. MANN. I take it there is no objection to any company making the lease for 50 years from the beginning of its term, as long as it has the power to make the lease——

Mr. STAFFORD. The question is as to the length of the lease beyond the expiration of the original 50-year period.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. STAFFORD. The purpose of this amendment is to grant that right of not more than 20 years after the expiration of the period.

Mr. MANN. I am in sympathy with the purpose; that is all right; that is only putting it 20 years beyond the expiration of the period. Let us have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection, and the amendment was again reported.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. With pleasure.

M. THOMSON of Illinois. What does "thereafter" mean? After the date of the contract or after the expiration of the lease?

Mr. STAFFORD. It means beyond the life of the lease.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I think it would be plainer if the gentleman said "for not more than 20 years after the expiration of the lease," instead of using the word "thereafter."

Mr. STAFFORD. I will ask unanimous consent——

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. The gentleman does not want to put the word "lease" in twice unless it is necessary.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. So if the lease for 50 years has expired and a further contract is desired the man can only have 20 years?

Mr. STAFFORD. The word "thereafter" refers to the expiration of the lease, of course.

Mr. FERRIS. May I call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the fact that this section entirely is an authorization to go beyond the life of the lease, and I do not believe it would be necessary to have a repetition of the word as suggested by the gentleman from Illinois. The whole theory is on going beyond the life of the lease. If the gentleman will permit me, I desire to say I am in entire sympathy, and I hope that the committee will agree to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. I think it is all right.

Mr. FERRIS. However, it may not be out of place to say a word as to why this section is inserted. The committee was especially anxious to give the lessee every advantage possible in competing with the water-power interests that have already crept away from us. For instance, suppose the lease had extended 40 years, and suppose a city advertised for bids for a lighting contract for 20 years. That would carry it 10 years beyond the life of a 50-year lease, and so it would place the Government lessee in a position where he could not compete with the competing power company that was probably in private ownership and without regulation, so that the section is undoubtedly necessary to the end we may not give the Secretary too much authority, and we make it as seems to be proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, it has been called to my attention that section 8 is a section that is going to be controverted and will require more attendance of the committee, and I ask unanimous consent that section 8 be for the present passed without prejudice, so we may go on and dispose of uncontroverted sections.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman if he will permit an amendment now to be pending to that section, so that it may be considered when the time comes to act upon it?

Mr. FERRIS. I have no objection at all.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, then I offer the following amendment. On line——

Mr. MANN. The section must be read first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the fact that the section has not been read and it would not be in order to offer an amendment until the section has been read.

Mr. FERRIS. The section will be open to amendment, and I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. MANN. I understand the request is to be passed over at least to-day?

Mr. FERRIS. I am perfectly willing to do so; undoubtedly we must have more Members here when that section is considered, but there are a lot of uncontroverted questions which the committee can dispose of at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to modify his request, so that section 8 be passed for this legislative day?

Mr. FERRIS. Does not the gentleman think if we finish the bill in the next hour there may be an hour of general debate on it, and put off the voting?

Mr. MANN. I do not think so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent that section 8 be passed over until the next legislative day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That in case of the development, generation, transmission, or use of power or energy under a lease given under this act in a State which has not provided a commission or other authority having power to regulate rates and service of electrical energy and the issuance of stock and bonds by public utility corporations engaged in power development, transmission, and distribution, the control of service and of charges for service to consumers and stock and bond issues shall be vested in the Secretary of the Interior or committed to such body as may be authorized by Federal statute until such time as the State shall provide a commission or other authority for such regulation and control.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I did not offer an amendment to section 3 and shall not offer an amendment to this section, because I think what will have to be done will be for some one to work the two sections out together very carefully.

I wish to again direct their attention for a moment to some matters now that I spoke about before. Section 3 provides in effect that wherever there is a transmission line that crosses a State line, then the Secretary of the Interior has control over the question of rates and the issuance of stocks and bonds. Section 9 provides that where the plant is wholly within the limits of a State and there is a State public utilities commission, that that commission has the control over the rates and also of the issuance of stocks and bonds. Now, what will naturally arise out of such a condition? It is a very easy matter to extend transmission lines across the boundary lines of a State, and under the terms of section 3, where a plant has been established and a public utilities commission of a State is in operation and control, as long as the lines are wholly within the State the company, the moment it puts its lines across the State boundary lines, transfers the jurisdiction, if we have the constitutional power—it does under the terms of this bill—from the utilities commission of the State, both as to rates and as to stocks and bonds, to the Secretary of the Interior. There is no avoidance of inextricable confusion if you attempt to put those two provisions in the statutes and operate under them, because they are in direct conflict with each other. If one of these corporations runs against a public utilities commission in a State and has issued or obtained the authority to issue or has been refused the authority to issue stocks and bonds and thinks that that company can do better with the Secretary of the Interior, they will build a transmission line across the State line some place, and the jurisdiction immediately passes away from the State and is vested in the Secretary of the Interior.

Of course, it goes without saying that the company will do that which is for the best interests of the company and not for the best interests of the public. It will have the power to transfer the jurisdiction over its charges and over the issuance of its stocks and bonds at its own will, at any time, from the Secretary of the Interior to the utilities commission, or vice versa. I am sure that no one desires to put the law in such a position as that. Of course, as we pass this bill it is not the final throw. I hope the gentlemen in charge of the bill as well as the gentlemen in the Interior Department will endeavor to write these provisions in some way so that at least there will be no conflict and no choice by the company as to which jurisdiction it will take.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. Of course, where a State has a public-utility commission and the business is clearly intrastate, is there any doubt in the gentleman's mind but that the bill as it stands would let the public-utility commission of that State control it?

Mr. MANN. There is not any doubt, if they have a transmission line across the State boundary——

Mr. FERRIS. I said where it was all intrastate.

Mr. MANN. Oh, where it was intrastate?

Mr. FERRIS. If hydroelectric energy is generated at a given place in one State and transmitted across State lines into another State, where it is consumed, is there any doubt in the gentleman's mind that that would divest the State of any jurisdiction at all over them, even though they had not a public-utility commission?

Mr. MANN. I do not know. I think we ought to exercise and retain jurisdiction. So there is no oversight between us on those two points.

Mr. FERRIS. I understand there is not, and I am more than appreciative of the gentleman's position on that. We have been trying to preserve some regulation for the public interest.

Now, let me ask the gentleman, In a State where they have no public-utility commission at all—and there are five of those States in the West, and I think probably seven, although I am not clear on that, but Montana is one, but there are five that have no public-utility commission—it is not the gentleman's thought that power generated in those States that have no public-utility commission at all, on land that belongs to us, should go without any control, is it?

Mr. MANN. Certainly not. Now, I have answered the gentleman's question satisfactorily, so let me ask the gentleman a question. Here is a power being generated near Chicago, in Wisconsin. We have a public-utilities commission. The State of Wisconsin has a public-utilities commission. It can send its current to Milwaukee or other places in Wisconsin and be under the control of the public-utilities commission in Wisconsin, but suppose that the public-utilities commission in Wisconsin——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Illinois may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the policy of the public-utilities commission in Wisconsin is not quite as lenient as is the policy of the Secretary of the Interior—and, of course, that policy will largely be a general policy—does my friend from Oklahoma think that that company ought to be permitted to escape the control by the public-utilities commission of Wisconsin by running a line across into Chicago, or some other point in Illinois, even though it does not do any business there?

Mr. FERRIS. No; I do not, and neither do I think, just as an humble example, that I ought to pay a 3-cent carfare on my road home to Oklahoma on roads that in some States have a 2-cent fare. My thought was, rather than to let them get away altogether without any regulation, we had better let the Secretary of the Interior do the best he could.

Mr. MANN. I am not in favor of getting away from regulation; far from it. What I want is to see regulation fixed so as to know who is going to exercise it. I have no objection myself to the Government regulating intrastate railroad rates or the Government regulating intrastate current rates, but we ought to know, and not give the company the choice as to which power it will put itself under.

This gives the company the power. Or, in the case that I stated, suppose they are running over into Illinois. That gives the Secretary of the Interior the control of the rates. Supposing they think his rates are too onerous, or suppose he will not let them issue stocks and bonds, and they abandon the lines running into Illinois; immediately another commission gets control of the rates.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Of course; but do not those precise troublesome conditions prevail with respect to interstate railroad rates?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me ask the gentleman, Does not the only difference between the regulation of railroads, intrastate and interstate, and the proposal laid down by us consist in the fact that the State commissions in railroad rates hold on to intrastate control, even if the lines do cross the State lines? And is there not a reason—perhaps an imperfect one, but is there not some reason—to think that where they cross State lines at all, electricity not being invisible, although on transmission lines it is more invisible than cracker boxes and wheat and corn and freight——

Mr. MANN. It is just as easy to locate as a cracker box. You can not tell until you get inside the cracker box what is inside there. There is no distinction, so far as that is concerned. In the railroad proposition the control is fixed. The United States Government directs the interstate roads, and the State controls the intrastate roads. But under the terms of this bill as to electric lighting to-day the Government may control all, and to-morrow the State utilities commission may control all.

Mr. FERRIS. That is by reason of the transmission line crossing the State line?

Mr. MANN. That is by reason of the company either adding a transmission line or cutting one out. It gives it the control; it gives it the right of saying which regulation it will take.

Mr. FERRIS. Has the gentleman an amendment prepared which will make the handling of electricity in interstate and intrastate business precisely as the railroad rates are with respect to interstate and intrastate business?

Mr. MANN. I had one, but I tore it up a little while ago.

Mr. FERRIS. The committee gains new hope and new enthusiasm, because if that seems so large a question to the gentleman who has given consideration to interstate-commerce questions for so long, surely the committee may consider that it has made at least a fair effort.

Mr. MANN. Do not misunderstand me. I am not making any criticism of the people who prepared the bill or put it in this shape, but I think there is a conflict between section 3 and section 9, although it can be worked out so that either the General Government or the State utilities commission has control. I think as a rule it may be desirable to let the State utilities commissions act where they have the power to act, although I do not say that that should be the policy. But I think that is something that the committee can work out.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois a question. I want to know if I understood him correctly or not. Is it his contention that if a company organized in Wisconsin and doing business in Wisconsin should extend its business in Illinois, and because it extends its business in Illinois and commences doing an interstate business instead of an intrastate business altogether, it takes the regulation of the Wisconsin business, done in that State alone, out of the hands of the public-utilities commission of the State of Wisconsin?

Mr. MANN. There is no controversy over that. The terms of the bill clearly do that.

Mr. CULLOP. I doubt that very much, as I have read it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. The gentleman does not mean that.

Mr. CULLOP. I do not understand this bill to take it entirely out of the hands of the State commission at any time.

Mr. MANN. Oh, absolutely; it takes it out, so far as the terms of the bill are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask for recognition in my own right.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will notice section 3, that——

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; I notice that the language in that regard in section 3 is identical with the language in this section 9 on that subject.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it is directly contrary.

Mr. CULLOP. So far as the regulation is concerned. I am trying to get the gentleman's view.

Mr. MANN. Section 9 does not affect any case except where the power is wholly within the limits of one State.

Mr. CULLOP. Section 9?

Mr. MANN. Yes; section 9. If there is transmission across the State line, section 9 does not apply.

Mr. CULLOP. That applies only to the State?

Mr. MANN. Only where it is wholly within the limits of a State; that is, the development, the generation, the transmission, and the use of the power must be wholly within the State under section 9. Then section 9 operates.

Mr. CULLOP. Does the language in either section 3 or section 9 make it obligatory upon the Secretary of the Interior to regulate the charge? The language of the section, as I take it, gives him the right to do so, if he elects to do so. Or it may remain within the jurisdiction of the State utilities commissions of the States.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think not; because the language is that "the power is hereby conferred upon the Secretary." That is not a discretionary power.

Mr. CULLOP. If he sees proper to exercise it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. That is not a discretionary power.

Mr. CULLOP. This is not a mandatory provision.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes.

Mr. CULLOP. That is where we are in disagreement. I do not agree to that construction, because the language does not warrant it.

Mr. MANN. Where we give the Secretary of the Interior certain power, not to be exercised in his discretion, he is bound to exercise that power.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, of course, it is true that the public utilities commissions of two States—two sister States, for instance, as in the illustration the gentleman has given, the States of Illinois and Wisconsin—do not altogether move along the same lines in regulation.

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. CULLOP. There is a difference in their power, or in the manner in which they exercise it in the regulation of charges. Now, all the time each of these sections provides "or as Congress may confer the power." In other words, Congress may create a commission; Congress may, by an enactment, lodge that power in the public-utility commission of any State in which any company may do an interstate business.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. The language of the bill——

Mr. CULLOP. I say if Congress sees fit.

Mr. MANN. Under the language of the bill the power is committed to such a body as may be authorized by Federal statute. In section 9 we can not authorize a State utilities commission to exercise that power.

Mr. CULLOP. But right here we are giving the public utilities commission power——

Mr. MANN. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon——

Mr. CULLOP. And Congress can extend that right.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; we do not give them any power at all. We have not the power to give them power. We do not take it ourselves.

Mr. CULLOP. In other words, we do not take it ourselves, and that leaves it with them.

Mr. MANN. That leaves it with them.

Mr. CULLOP. It is just the same thing expressed in another form.

Mr. MANN. It is a very different thing.

Mr. CULLOP. It amounts to the same thing.

Mr. MANN. No; not by any means.

Mr. CULLOP. I beg to differ with the gentleman on that.

Mr. MANN. If we could confer power on them, we could make them do things, and we could fix the terms on which they should do them and regulate them, but we can not do it by withholding it.

Mr. CULLOP. We confer power on them by withholding it from ourselves. That is what this statute is doing, and it is arriving at the same results, except in a different way. It means one and the same thing, and therefore the difference is merely one of expression, of form, instead of real substance. It is the difference between tweedle dee and tweedle dum. In other words, the State exercises the power because the Federal Government does not elect to exercise it. Now, so long as the States do not abuse the power they will be doubless permitted to exercise it, but the moment it is abused, then the Federal Government can step in and exercise it and see that fair dealing between the producer and consumer is maintained.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I should like the attention of the committee for a moment.

On several occasions during this debate I have tried to call attention to this particular feature of the bill, and I am satisfied that after the discussion between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the chairman of the committee [Mr. FERRIS] the committee as a whole understand what I was trying to get at.

Subdivision b of section 16, page 13 of House bill 17854, that I introduced, not with the hope of having it passed, but with the idea of presenting to this committee and to the House a plan for the development and use of hydroelectric power which I believe to be feasible, reads as follows:

(b) That when the power generated by such project enters both interstate and intrastate commerce, the commission is hereby authorized to join with any State in which such power is used in effecting such joint and interlocking system of Federal and State regulation as in its judgment shall most effectively promote the general public interest and carry out the purposes of this act.

Not more than two years ago nearly all the students of hydroelectric power contended that even though a single plant or group of united or tied-in plants located within a single State transmitted electric current into two or more States, the public utilities commission of each State into which current is brought should have the sole power to regulate service and rates. However, at the present time these same parties are advocating that when current from a single plant or combination of plants is used in two or more States their service and rates should be controlled by the Federal Government.

The reason they assign for changing their views on this subject is that in order to fix an equitable rate you must first ascertain the value of the plant and cost of operation as a whole, and since the only jurisdiction coextensive with the plant is that of the Federal Government, therefore it is manifestly necessary that the Federal Government should exercise control over interstate current in some form or another. Under section 3 of the pending bill plants are permitted to combine, and as electric current can be produced more economically by the union of power plants, it is more than probable that a number of plants will unite. Thus by far the larger portion of electric energy will be interstate, and unless some such plan as I have suggested is adopted the State utilities commissions will have but little voice in the regulation of rates and service.

A State utilities commission is more in touch with the local situation than a bureau located in Washington would or could be. Therefore, since the exigencies of the case make it impracticable for State commissions, unaided by the Federal Government, to fix rates and service, the Federal Government should assist the State commission to fix such rates and service and not deprive the States of all rights in the premises, as is contemplated in the legislation proposed by the committee.

Moreover, under a joint and interlocking system of Federal and State regulation, such as I propose, there could be no "twilight zone" in which the hydroelectric monopoly could live in security and play hide and seek with the State and Federal Governments. First its current would be interstate and then local, whichever best subserved the purpose of the trust. If, perchance, the bill under consideration becomes a law in its present form, its most mischievous and objectionable feature will be the opportunity it affords these mammoth companies to escape effective regulation.

Those objectionable features of the pending bill were pointed out so clearly in the debate to-day by both the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and by the chairman of the committee [Mr. FERRIS] that there should be little doubt left in the minds of the committee as to the advisability of amending the proposed bill in either the way I suggest or in some other way that will eliminate this dangerous feature.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will yield, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of five minutes all debate on this section be closed. There is no amendment pending except the pro forma one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that at the end of five minutes all debate on this section be closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] discussed the pending section before the committee. I am sorry he was not here yesterday to indorse my amendments to section 3, which would have lifted the committee out of the mire in which it finds itself. Of course this section, when read in connection with section 3, renders the bill rather ridiculous in regard to this matter of regulation where an enterprise is in two States; and in order to have the bill conform to what must eventually be the rule in the case, and at the same time use the power of the Federal Government as a proprietor to strengthen the arm of the State, I offered this provision:

That all leases shall be granted upon the condition and subject to the reservation that at all times during the use and enjoyment thereof, and of the water power appropriated and used in connection therewith, the service and charges therefor, including all electric power generated or used in connection therewith, shall be subject to the regulation and control of the State within which the same is used, and subject to the fixing of the rates and charges for the use thereof and the issuance of securities by such State or under its authority.

Now, that must be the rule. There can not be any other rule, no matter what may be written into this statute. You can not make interstate commerce of a great power plant having a capital of $2,000,000 or $10,000,000 simply by reason of the fact that it runs a spider-web wire across a State line. That is ridiculous on its face. And still that is what the section attempts to do.

Now, if the committee had adopted my amendment to section 3 the matter would have been cleared up. The States would have control, as they do without any legislation, and particularly in that western country, where our control of these things is bottomed on our recognition of the public ownership of water.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Would you carry the analogy still further——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes, so that I may ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman from Wyoming be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. We would like to have a chance to ask a question once in a while.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if we can not debate this bill in good faith I think we shall be obliged to invoke the rule relative to a quorum.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I am a friend of the bill, and I should like to have an opportunity to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this question is exhausted, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 10. That where the Secretary of the Interior shall determine that the value of any lands, heretofore or hereafter reserved as water-power sites or for purposes in connection with water-power development or electrical transmission, will not be materially injured for such purposes by either location, entry, or disposal, the same may be allowed under applicable land laws upon the express condition that all such locations, entries, or other methods of disposal shall be subject to the sole right of the United States and its authorized lessees or grantees to enter upon, occupy, and use any part or all of such lands reasonably necessary for the accomplishment of all purposes connected with the development, generation, transmission, or utilization of power or energy, and all rights acquired in such lands shall be subject to a reservation of such sole right to the United States, its lessees or grantees, which reservation shall be expressed in the patent or other evidence of title: Provided, That locations, entries, selections, or filings heretofore allowed for lands reserved as water-power sites or in connection with water-power development or electrical transmission may proceed to approval or patent under and subject to the limitations and conditions in this section contained, but nothing herein shall be construed to deny or abridge rights now granted by law to those seeking to use the public lands for purposes of irrigation or mining alone.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 4, after the word "title," insert the following: "Provided, That those who may use such lands for power purposes under the provisions of this act shall pay the entryman or owner under this section the fair value of the lands used exclusive of their value for power purposes, and for all damages to crops and improvements by reason of such occupancy."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this section is a very important one; and, while I do not exactly like its form and would prefer a somewhat different provision, still I think that if this amendment were adopted it would be reasonably satisfactory.

There are large areas of lands withdrawn for power sites which will not be utilized for a great many years to come for power development. All individuals who live in the public-land States recognize that fact. In my State there are several large areas withdrawn, and a considerable portion of those lands, if they ever can be utilized for power purposes, it will be in the distant future. There is no demand for them now for power purposes. The lands are in demand from time to time for homes for cultivation, irrigation settlement, and for various purposes, and should be utilized.

There is no provision under the title which this section gives whereby the owner can receive any compensation for such of his land as is taken for power purposes. It seems to me there is no reason why the owner should not be paid a fair value for the land other than its value for power purposes. He may be cultivating the land for the next 20 years, or 40 or 50; and if some big power company comes along and wants to put a plant on his land, they certainly will be able to pay, and ought to pay, the owner a fair price for the land, and they ought to pay him the value of his improvements.

The amendment I have sent up to the desk is practically the language of the law with relation to the limited ownership of coal and oil and gas land. Where these lands are taken over by those who seek to utilize their mineral product, they pay to the owner under the limited fee the value of the land taken and of the crops destroyed and of the improvements.

Now, if we do that on coal lands and oil lands, where the development is frequently by men of limited means, there is all the more reason why we should do it when we come to development in which the undertaking involved includes vast investments by people of large financial means. They can certainly afford to pay the owner of the land its fair value other than its value for the purposes for which they desire it. They can afford to pay him for his house if they tear it down, and for his crops if they destroy them, and it is in the public interest that they should pay it.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, this section was put in the bill on the theory that in some instances greater areas of land were withdrawn than will be used for power purposes. The thought was that if a man wants to go in and use the surface of the lands pending the time when they should be used for power purposes, subject to the superior right, then they could develop them. But if the gentleman's amendment was adopted he would make the power company, who later came along to develop the power, pay for the value of the land and improvements taken, which would be a condition sufficiently onerous to drive away and destroy the development of the water-power privilege, a thing that no one wants to do. There will be a question in the minds of some whether a limited entry should be made at all.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will, gladly.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Is there any power given the Secretary of the Interior in this bill for the condemnation of private property for these power plants?

Mr. FERRIS. No.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Does not the gentleman recognize the fact that there might be a contingency that would require the condemnation of land for the construction of reservoirs at points far remote from the actual plant?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Colorado is proceeding on the theory that the Government intends to install the plant. That is not the fact and is not the theory of the bill. The theory of the bill is that the Federal Government will lease the water power, and the men that are developing the power subject to the provisions of the bill and regulations will buy the rights of way, flowage, and all that sort of thing.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; certainly.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Does this bill affect a State where the public lands are not in question, where there are no public lands?

Mr. FERRIS. Not at all.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. The Muskegon River and the Grand River and other rivers in Michigan go through the State where there are no public lands. As I understand, this bill does not apply to those rivers at all.

Mr. FERRIS. Not at all. The gentleman might confront some provisions of the Adamson dam bill which control navigable rivers, but this bill deals only with public lands and does not affect the gentleman's State at all.

Mr. LEVY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. LEVY. At the termination of the lease somebody may have power houses, and is there any provision for paying for them?

Mr. FERRIS. Precisely; it pays for all property leased to another; they pay the actual costs for the nonperishable property and a fair value for all perishable property.

Mr. LEVY. That is where this question comes in now and where the suggestion of the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming has a direct bearing. Now, in the State of Virginia they have the right to condemn for power houses in the State.

Mr. FERRIS. That is a State statute, is it not?

Mr. LEVY. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. The Federal Government has nothing to do with private lands.

Mr. LEVY. If it came in at the termination of the lease and they took the power house they ought to pay the value of it.

Mr. FERRIS. Of course this bill has nothing whatever to do with lands in private ownership.

Mr. LEVY. Then they would be cut off from that power house.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, not at all. The bill specifically says that where the plant is built on Government land it shall be paid for before it is taken.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Does the gentleman maintain under this bill that where a power company should construct reservoirs on private land, at the expiration of the lease the Government could step in and require that corporation to part with its holdings that it had acquired on private lands?

Mr. FERRIS. Precisely; and that is in the interest of the power people. If they acquire the bung barrel, the eye of the needle, which is the dam site, from us, and they acquire other links in the chain from other sources, they would want to sell all or none; and it would be in the interest of the Government to take it over as an entity, for no one would want to buy a single link in the chain or to buy the bung without the barrel.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. But there might be a question as to what was the bung and what was the barrel in some cases.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true; but in either event my premise would be sound.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does not the gentleman think a great power company would be very badly hampered if it had to pay the farmer $10 or $20 or $30 an acre for the land that he had made valuable or for the house that they tore down?

Mr. FERRIS. Not at all; but I think it is a matter of the keenest doubt whether or not a homesteader whose rights are inferior and whose surface rights would be worth $5 an acre should have the right to interfere with a power plant that might be worth $10,000,000; and this section lets the surface of the property be farmed, with full notice to the homesteader that whenever the superior right comes in—to wit, the development of power thereon—he must either get out of the way or submit to such flowage or rights of way as may come in connection with the project. No one would say that the Federal Government ought to be forced to buy out a lot of homesteaders.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The purpose of this section is to reserve this land, or land already reserved for power purposes, that there might be an additional and extra use made of it for farming, homesteading, desert claims, or otherwise; that the party may file on it after the Secretary of the Interior determines that for the immediate use it appears that it is not at that time necessary. But he takes the grant, or, in the first instance, he makes his application, with the understanding that whenever the Government or its lessee desires any of this land for power purposes it may take it; otherwise it would be foolish to take this law in here. Having reserved it for this purpose, you do not want to turn it over for homesteading, desert-land claims, or any other claims, and dispose of the title in fee and then compel the Government or its grantee to condemn it or buy it back for the very purpose that you originally reserved it for.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I noticed the gentleman used the term "grantee." The bill uses the term "lessee." What is meant by "grantee" in this section?

Mr. RAKER. Lessee or grantee. That word "grantee" was used, practically speaking, covering the word "lessee."

Mr. MANN. Then would it not be better to strike it out?

Mr. RAKER. It would not do any harm. I remember distinctly that the committee said it would do no harm to use the word "grantee" because it covers "lessee."

Mr. MANN. But you do not use it anywhere else.

Mr. RAKER. I think the gentleman is correct about that. The committee and those who appeared before the committee had this in view, that while we want to conserve the public domain and the public property for uses that might be made for the purpose of developing hydroelectric power in all its forms for ditches, houses, plants, or reservoirs, it should be done, but at the same time we are beginning to realize that a reservation simply to mark imaginary lines around a large tract of land and saying that is conservation, but not using it, means nothing. It is absurd; it is ridiculous, but we can reserve it; we can have it prepared for its highest use, and if in the meantime it can be used for surface or underground, for any other purpose, and men desire to take a chance, and they will, it ought to be so used, and then we should give them that permission to use it, but we should specify in the grant of that land the condition that it is always subject to the right of the Government to take it, to the right of the lessee of the Government to take it, and you ought not to specify as in the gentleman's amendment. Then comes up the same question, as it would now if you did not reserve it, that the Government grantee or the Government itself would have to condemn or go into court to determine the value of the land that it is going to use, and we ought not to complicate the bill in that way.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does the gentleman not think that in view of the fact that the Interior Department has withdrawn from entry a very large amount of land so as to be sure to cover all possibilities—for instance, for power sites they have withdrawn land that is from 3 to 5 miles up on the mountain—where they have withdrawn so much land, hundreds of thousands of acres, and all of that land is hereafter, I suppose, going to be open to entry, would it not be better that the company should pay something for the actual improvements, we will say, that they destroy on a piece of ground, if any—not the land, but the improvements? Ought they not to pay for the improvements rather than have a cloud upon the real estate of the possibility of some one going over them and paying nothing for it? Would not that depreciate the value of the real estate?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent to close debate on this section at the end of 15 minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have two amendments which I desire to offer to this section and I would like to be heard on both of them.

Mr. FERRIS. Five minutes apiece?

Mr. MONDELL. Five minutes on each of them, but I want to be heard as I offer the amendments.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of 25 minutes we close debate on this section, 5 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], 10 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and 10 minutes by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 25 minutes, 5 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], 10 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and 10 minutes by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, now, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Colorado, I believe that the statement he presented is a good one, that it is no more than right to pay for the actual improvements made upon the land, and that looks fair and right, but this amendment says those who may use such land for power purposes under the provisions of this act shall pay the entryman or owner under this section the fair value of the land. Now, the very purpose and object is to avoid these complications. The land is reserved now, the land is held for that purpose, and it ought to be if there are these possibilities, if we are going to use the system of leasing lands for power purposes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. For the Government lands granted under it the Government requires pay for water purposes, does it not?

Mr. RAKER. Practically no pay; it is practically all turned over.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There is some compensation, is there not?

Mr. RAKER. Practically no compensation. It is homesteaded.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. They are not all under the homestead law?

Mr. RAKER. Practically under the homestead law or the desert-claims law. That is the way the country has developed, and I am in favor of continuing it, and that being the case it is opened up. When the Secretary of the Interior says it can be used for some other purpose, maybe 5, 10, 20, or 50 years, it ought to be used and it ought not to lie idle. As the gentleman from Colorado has well said, there are hundreds of thousands of acres of land withdrawn. The purpose of this is the Government ought to use the land that is withdrawn, use it all you can for power purposes, permit it to be developed to the end that these communities might prosper, that they may get cheaper electric energy and save the timber upon the hills that will hold back the water that will make the country better instead of leaving it barren as it is to-day.

Mr. LEVY, Mr. SMITH of Minnesota, and Mr. MONDELL rose.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. There are so many handsome gentlemen I hardly know how to yield, but I will yield first to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

Mr. LEVY. Now, in case of a power station it may be in the position where the Government does not own any land, and you have to condemn for a site——

Mr. RAKER. I will answer that.

Mr. LEVY. And I know of cases in Virginia where unimproved land has been condemned for a power house as high as $3,600 an acre.

Mr. RAKER. You can in this city. It would be possible to condemn the best hotel in the land, the most palatial residence anywhere, if it becomes necessary to put a power house upon it, but that is not involved.

This bill deals entirely with the Government's land and the Government's land alone, and the man who obtains a lease upon Government land, if he wants anything further—or the corporation, if it is a corporation under the State—can then proceed under the State law to condemn additional tracts of land to use for his plant and power house. If he can not buy by agreement with the party, he may condemn and pay for it. We are dealing solely and entirely with Government property owned by the Government alone.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I now yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Is there any greater use you can put land to than that of agriculture?

Mr. RAKER. Why, yes, in some instances. Here is a large tract of land on a mountain side and in a canyon on which agriculture can not be carried on, of which but little use can be made. Now, to permit a desert claim or homestead upon that land, which, if used for a power site, might enable the company to go in here and build a dam, put up a power plant by which they could light all the cities surrounding it, by which they could furnish electricity for every home that might be lighted as brilliantly at night at it is in the day, and if we let this electric energy go down in those valleys that are now barren and burned up for the want of water, and there allow them to pump water, these people might be able to build homes upon thousands of acres of land that to-day are absolutely idle. In such a case and under such conditions we ought to reserve that land and use it for an electric plant and build an electric plant on it, to the end that the entire community surrounding, a distance perhaps of hundreds of miles, might be thus benefited, instead of permitting a few men to locate and——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I agree that there ought to be a reservation in the bill, but it is perfectly patent to me that many cases will arise where the power company has to pay for the damage or else there will be private claims which we will pay in private claims bills. It will not infrequently happen that along the line of a stream the Secretary of the Interior may now determine that there is no probability of water-power development at that place, and along the lines of a stream entrymen will go in and settle up the land. In the course of time another Secretary of the Interior will find, with the decreased cost of power development and possibly the increased power and increased value of power, that it will pay to have a power development at that place. Now, under the reservation in the patents you can grant a lease to the power company to go in there and overflow all of the land of the homesteader or the owner. That is a reservation, I think, properly reserved, but there is no power under the terms of this bill to require the company to pay the owner of the land for the property which is absolutely taken away from him.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. This amendment under consideration here requires them to pay for that land.

Mr. MANN. I am not talking about the amendment under consideration.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is speaking in favor of it, and he is likely to get the House to adopt an amendment he is not in favor of himself.

Mr. MANN. I am talking about the section in the bill, and not the amendment I am discussing that section of the bill in the hope of calling the attention of the committee to a matter that may be remedied before the bill becomes a law. I think it would be unconscionable to take away the farm of a man who is given a farm, when he had a right to believe it never will be taken away from him—although you retain the reservation of the right—without ever making him any compensation.

Mr. FERGUSSON. As I understand, this applies only to public land that comes up against the streams, and if it is reserved a man may locate a homestead on it, thinking he can get some water and irrigate it, and he takes it, then, subject to the prior right of the Government to use a part of his land on which to build a dam. That is all there is to it, in my judgment.

Mr. MANN. He takes it like anybody else takes any other public land at any other place. He takes it and develops it. He takes it with the knowledge that the Secretary of the Interior has found that the land will not be materially injured by the power development. But the reservation does not contain that; and afterwards the Government determines to take it away from him by giving it to a power company. Now, no one can say that the man's house and his barn and his cultivated fields should be overflowed by the water for the benefit of the power company and the power company make no compensation for it. Yet that is the provision of the bill.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. RAKER. Does not the gentleman believe, so far as the land is concerned, that he takes it with knowledge that he gets nothing for the land?

Mr. MANN. I do not think he ought to be required to do that, nor do I think that Congress would ever make him do it in the end. The man who takes that land, when the Government gives him the right to take it, has the right to suppose that he has the right to cultivate it.

Mr. RAKER. If that is the case——

Mr. MANN. Now, we have had a committee of this House report time and again in favor of paying to the owners of the land the entire value of the land out in Oregon, where they took it without authority at all, and they were ousted from it by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The bill that will pass, if it ever passes—they will never get it through with my vote—will pass with the vote of the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] and all the rest of the committee.

Mr. RAKER. It appealed to my heart, and I could not resist it.

Mr. MANN. Of course. You can not do unconscionable things and make them stand. I think we ought to reserve the right, so that nobody can hold up the company. But give to the Secretary of the Interior the power to require the developer on the land—I mean the developer of the power—to pay for the value of the land or any other thing that he has taken, and give him the power, so that you can hold up the company, so that you can not prevent its development. Of course these situations will not ever arise in our day and generation, but they may arise 50 or 100 years from now when the community is settled up. This reservation and the patent runs on the land forever, unless Congress releases it, and 50 or 100 years from now, or maybe in a shorter time, some prosperous community may find itself wiped off of the face of the map, without any recompense at all, in favor of some great company that wants to develop power and that ought to be permitted to develop the power.

Mr. RAKER. Does not the gentleman believe that if we pay for the actual improvement and development that that would be about fair?

Mr. MANN. Oh, well, this land is not worth anything now, is it?

Mr. RAKER. That is true.

Mr. MANN. The man who goes on it and develops it, and makes it worth $25 or $50 an acre, is just as much entitled to the value of it, because with the development they have made that value. When they go on it, it is not worth anything. They have made the value, and in conscience the Government can not take it away from them. Nor do I think a power company should have the right to run a transmission line across a man's farm, probably attaching it to his house, without making any compensation or settlement with him.

I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] the balance of my time.

Mr. FERRIS. How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for four minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I did not try to reserve any time for the committee, because I think I had the right and reason to rely on the gentleman from Illinois being on the right side of this question.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am.

Mr. FERRIS. But if ever in the future should he be wrong, or if never in the past he was wrong, he is undoubtedly wrong now.

This is the equation that presents itself here: The Government has gone out with the best lights it had before it and has withdrawn areas of land. What for? For power purposes. The country has placed its approval upon that withdrawal. Now, the section of the bill provides that entrymen may go in and make a limited entry thereon. Now comes along the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] with an amendment, which reads that for every power that is developed they must pay not only for the improvement but also for the land.

I say to you, Mr. Chairman, that if this amendment is adopted, that will require payment from the Government or its assignee, first, for the improvement, and, second, for the land, you could give away every power site in this country. The Federal Government always has the right to buy property for its own use. The Federal Government would have the right to buy property if you gave a patent in fee, and we could go and condemn it for a public purpose under existing statutes in the interest of the development of water for irrigation. I do not understand that the gentleman bases his amendment entirely on the part that requires the Government to pay for the land, but in answer to an interrogatory propounded to the gentleman by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] I thought he also did that.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is continually talking about "the Government." The Government is not going to develop these powers.

Mr. FERRIS. I am going to come to that in a moment. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] very ingeniously says that some ingenious power company will come in and take this property. If the Government places such conditions upon these power sites that nobody will touch them, the Government will have destroyed all interest and value in these power companies.

The gentleman from Illinois is entirely wrong. That is a pretty broad statement for me to make of him, because he is pretty nearly always on the right side in the discussion of these questions. Although he sometimes irritates me by objecting to a little bill that I may have up, he is almost always right. But when he comes in here with the proposition of practically giving away every power site in this country he undertakes to do too much, and the House ought not to let such an amendment go in.

The gentleman does not give his full approval to the amendment offered, but in his debate upon it he does say and does go almost to the extent that I have stated. He commands more votes on both sides of the aisle than any of the others of us, and therefore he should be careful in placing stumblingblocks and onerous conditions in these provisions that would almost destroy the value of power sites that are reserved.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has two amendments to offer.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I prefer to have five minutes of my time now, if the gentleman does not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised, indeed, at the attitude of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, let me submit a point of order, if I may. The gentleman, of course, has already spoken on the question once.

Mr. MONDELL. I had 10 minutes of the discussion. I am using 5 of it now. Of course, if the gentleman objects——

Mr. FERRIS. That is true, but I want to submit a parliamentary observation. I thought the committee had the right to close the debate.

Mr. MANN. The committee has no rights as to that at all.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Illinois gave me four minutes.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but I had not the right to close.

Mr. FERRIS. I recognize that. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote on the amendment now.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming calls for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 12, noes 20.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 11, after the word "seeking," insert "to secure lands under the homestead or desert-land laws or."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have been surprised a good many times during the discussion of this bill, but not so much as I was a moment ago when some Members from the public-land States deliberately put themselves on record as against the common, plain, ordinary rights of a homestead settler. Those gentlemen ought to know—others may not—what these power sites are. There was one in my State of Wyoming at one time that was 120 miles long and averaged 3 miles wide. They have voted down an amendment which provided that if people made homes on such lands as provided in this bill, and they were needed for power purposes later, they would receive the value of their land and improvements. As the bill now stands they would get nothing.

There is a power site on Green River, in my State, now several miles long and about a mile wide, in a beautiful valley, the best land in that whole section that can be irrigated. Sometime, a hundred years from now, someone may want to put a great dam at the mouth of the canyon at the lower end of that valley. It will cost at least a million or two to do it. And yet gentlemen from the public-land States say that a power company, proposing to invest $2,000,000 in a dam and as much more in other features of an enterprise, can not afford to pay the homesteader, who, perhaps, has lived on the land for 50 years, the value of his log cabin and of the land that he has improved and made valuable.

I am not complaining particularly about the withdrawal of such of these lands as some day in the reasonable future may be needed for power purposes, but everyone knows that lands such as I have referred to can not be utilized by this generation, and possibly never will be utilized. You say to the people, under this section, "You can go in there among the mountain fastnesses and develop these lands; you can irrigate them at great labor and expense; you can live there until a power company comes along and orders you off, then they can take everything you have and everything you have made." It would be much better to have the section go out, and leave these tracts remain forever unused than to invite settlers in to make homes upon them and later divest those settlers of all they have in the world. A change has come over the spirit of these gentlemen's dreams recently. A few years ago I introduced and we passed a bill for limited entries of coal lands, and not more than a month ago we passed a similar bill for limited entries of oil and phosphate lands, and we provided that when a coal prospector or an oil prospector comes on those lands, held under limited patents, he shall pay all damage to crops or buildings or improvements, and if he takes the lands he shall pay the value of the lands. But when it comes to dealing with power companies we are tender. When we come to dealing with people who expend millions for the development of power, you say in effect, "Let them wipe the homesteader off the map. Who cares? It does not affect the East, anyway." But it does affect my State, and it does affect every State in the West where these withdrawals have been made, and where lands are reserved—some improperly, in my opinion, and others properly—in the belief that sometime the land will be utilized for power purposes. In the meantime the land ought to be utilized for home-making purposes, and when the home maker has established his little home along the stream, developed the property, and made improvements, he ought not be brushed aside and lose all he has at the hands of some wealthy power company.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I want to say, concerning the gentleman's amendment that we just voted upon, that I agreed with him and voted with him. I think the power companies ought to pay for the property they destroy. I do not mean the pending amendment, but the prior amendment. Now, why does not the gentleman offer another amendment leaving out the price of the land taken and make it applicable to the improvements, and let us see if we can not adopt that on the ground that that would be better than nothing? I think possibly we could carry that amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Because I think if a man has made his land worth $10 or $20 or $30 an acre it is not going to break any power company to have to pay him for it. That is why I do not intend to modify my amendment.

My present amendment is to preserve the rights that men now have, the rights that have been guaranteed to them under the withdrawal act. Under the withdrawal act we provided that prior homesteaders and desert entrymen should not be affected in their rights by power-site withdrawals, if their rights were initiated and held in good faith, but by this legislation you are wiping out those rights. We have therefore protected and offered them only a limited right which may be entirely taken from them by a power company.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. What do you think would be the effect if the committee should strike out all, beginning with the word "but," in line 9, page 9, down to the end of the section? I may say that that language of the bill is my own. I was trying to take care of and protect our mining and irrigation rights. In putting in those last three lines my thought was that they were of the utmost importance to the irrigation and the mining rights of the West, and I thought the homestead and desert-land entrymen were fairly well protected in the fore part of the section.

Mr. MONDELL. I object to striking it out, for this reason: You propose to leave in this section the proviso:

Provided, That locations, entries, selections, or filings heretofore allowed for lands reserved as water-power sites or in connection with water-power development or electrical transmission may proceed to approval or patent under and subject to the limitations and conditions in this section contained.

This refers only to those who had initiated their rights prior to withdrawal. We have expressly protected them if they were homesteaders or desert entrymen in former legislation. This refers to him who is already on the ground, who has his house there, and may have had his homestead years before the land was withdrawn for power purposes. You say, "Yes, you can stay, Bill Jones. You have been there a long time. We can not drive you away, but you do not get anything that a power company can not take away from you any day it takes a fancy to do so." The gentleman does not think the people of his section will justify that sort of thing. Nowhere on earth can there be anybody who will justify that sort of thing if familiar with the situation. Now, the gentleman suggests striking out language which while it does not fully protect the home maker does to a certain extent. I think the gentleman and I are not far apart in our view of these matters, and I do not think the gentleman would want to take from the section the little virtue it has.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman from Wyoming gets wrought up to too high a pitch. These people are not getting any title at all now. As far as that is concerned, nobody is getting any title anywhere under existing conditions, and I want to open up to settlement the lands that are now withdrawn for power sites.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. They are getting title. There is a law that guarantees homesteaders and desert entrymen their title. Their title is guaranteed if you do not pass this law. The law expressly provides that withdrawals for power purposes shall not defeat prior homesteaders or desert entrymen of their rights.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Those who have gone on after the withdrawal are not getting any title of any kind now.

Mr. MONDELL. This applies to those who went there before.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, they are not getting any title, either.

Mr. MONDELL. This applies to those who may have been there 10 years before.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have the same conditions in Colorado that you have in Wyoming. This section is not as complete or satisfactory as I would like, but it is the best I could get on the committee. Now, the question is whether mining and irrigation ought to remain in or come out; that is about the size of it. I think that provision ought to stay in, and I fear your amendment may destroy this provision.

Mr. MONDELL. It ought to stay in, and my amendment ought to go in, preserving the rights of the homesteader and the desert entryman, as the law now preserves his rights—the man who was there before the withdrawal.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the law now preserves and protects his rights, he is safe.

Mr. MONDELL. The law can not preserve his rights if you pass this later act. My former amendment was intended to preserve the rights as to receiving the value of his property in case it is taken, who may go on these power-site lands and make entry under the invitation this section provides for; that was turned down. Now, I offer an amendment to save complete the rights of the homesteader or desert entryman who was on the ground before the power site was withdrawn.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming would not strike out the provision for the right to use the land for irrigation and mining purposes?

Mr. MONDELL. I would not. The present law gives the prior homesteader the right to a fee title. I want to preserve that right.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman does not contend that a man can go on a reservation and reserve any land for power purposes and get a patent for it now?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from California knows, or should know, that there are scores and perhaps hundreds of homesteaders now on power-site withdrawals who were there before the withdrawal was made, and the withdrawal act expressly relieves them from the effects of the withdrawal; but if you adopt this provision the only title they can get is one under which a power company can divest them of all their rights and pay them nothing.

Mr. RAKER. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that every man who has met his filing on a homestead or a desert entry, before he made his final proof and the land was withdrawn can be denied the patent if the Government wants to do it.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not agree with the gentleman as to the right of the Government to do that. Furthermore, we have done quite a different thing; the withdrawal act of August 24, 1912, provides as to the effect of all withdrawals:

And provided further, That there shall be excepted from the force and effect of any withdrawal made under the provisions of this act all lands which are, on the date of such withdrawal, embraced in any lawful homestead or desert-land entry theretofore made, or upon which any valid settlement has been made and is at said date being maintained and perfected pursuant to law.

Now, you propose to say to him, "If you have not in the meantime got your patent we will give you a limited right under which some high-brow power developer may come along and wipe you off the face of the earth and take your home and your land."

Mr. RAKER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the fact that if it is right and proper that the land should be reserved for power purposes, and if it will develop a great enterprise of great advantage to the public, ought not it to be done?

Mr. MONDELL. If there is any enterprise worth its salt it is an enterprise that can afford to pay for the property it takes from the owner, be he a rich or a poor homesteader. If it can not afford to do that, it ought never to be developed. If it is not an enterprise that can afford to pay men for homes and farms taken from them, it is not an enterprise that ever should be considered by anybody.

Mr. RAKER. No man's homestead or desert claim ought to be taken from him by anybody.

Mr. MONDELL. That is just what you are proposing to do. You may not realize it, but you are.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were 16 ayes and 21 noes.

Mr. MONDELL. I demand tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming demands tellers. All those in favor of tellers will rise. [After a pause.] Seven gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number, and tellers are refused.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the observation that there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. FERRIS. Will not the gentleman withhold his point of no quorum?

Mr. MONDELL. He will not. You can not take away the rights of the homestead settlers in my State without a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Forty-five Members present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FITZGERALD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 16673, had found itself without a quorum, that he had directed the roll to be called, and that 201 Members had answered to their names—a quorum—and he reported the names of the absentees.

The committee resumed its sitting.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I think that question was settled before the point of order of no quorum was made.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the Chair rule that that vote was taken and concluded?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is under the impression that the vote has been taken, and that then the gentleman demanded tellers. Tellers were refused, and the gentleman then made the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. May I demand tellers on my amendment at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers were refused when the gentleman demanded tellers before.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Chairman, tellers were refused by a lack of a quorum. A Member can not be cut out from having a vote on his amendment by a quorum of the committee.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman did not demand a quorum upon the vote upon the amendment, but did ask for tellers and tellers were refused, and the announcement was made; and then the gentleman demanded a quorum, and the question is not now at issue.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but the gentleman asked for tellers.

Mr. FERRIS. But tellers were refused.

Mr. MANN. Tellers were refused by what?

Mr. FERRIS. It had not developed at that time that there was no quorum present.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman made the point of order of no quorum, and it then developed that there was not a quorum present to refuse tellers. If that side of the House wants to force us to make a point of no quorum before every vote is taken, very well, we will do it; but the gentleman sees how it would work. The gentleman asks for a division, we will say, and then asks for tellers. There is not a quorum of the committee present. If a majority of the House—and I do not mean that majority——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Wyoming is entitled to have the question of whether the committee will order tellers determined at this time. As many as are in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty Members have risen, a sufficient number, and tellers are ordered. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 39, noes 64.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 8, line 22, the words "or grantees."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 8, line 22, strike out the words "or grantees."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman's amendment——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this section has closed.

Mr. RAKER. I rise for the purpose of offering an amendment, if the gentleman from Illinois thinks that it is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. But debate is not in order at this time. The gentleman may offer an amendment, but he may not debate it.

Mr. MANN. It is the same thing, to move to strike out those words on page 9?

Mr. RAKER. I move to insert the word "or" between the words "United States" and the word "its," in line 2.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from California may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, on page 9, line 2, to insert, after the words "United States," the word "or."

Mr. MANN. That is all right, but I have not yet moved to strike out the words "or grantees" on that page. I am just coming to that.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, I thought that was the place where the gentleman had moved to strike them out.

Mr. MANN. No; I moved to strike them out on page 8, line 22.

Mr. RAKER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 9, line 3, the words "or grantees" and to insert, after the words "United States," in line 2, in place of the comma, the word "and."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 9, line 3, strike out the words "or grantees," and on line 2, page 9, strike out the comma and insert in lieu thereof the word "and."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the section insert the following:
"And it shall be a condition of any lease made under this act, including lands entered and held under the provisions of this section, that the lessee shall pay the owner the value of any land taken or used other than its value for power purposes and of all improvements thereon."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that we have already voted on that identical proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Chair would not attempt to dispose of an amendment in that fashion. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were—ayes 26, noes 52.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming demands tellers. Those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-one gentlemen have risen, a sufficient number, and tellers are ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. MONDELL and Mr. FERRIS) reported that there were—ayes 33, noes 49.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation or for municipal or other uses, or any vested right acquired thereunder.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

Mr. FERRIS. What section is that?

Mr. MANN. Section 14. Mr. Chairman, this bill all the way through is intended to and does conserve the power of the United States over its water-power sites. It gives to the Secretary of the Interior the right to control rates, charges, and the issuance of stocks and bonds. It gives the Government the right to take this property and pay only for certain values and not for franchises or promotion values. Having done all this to protect the right of the General Government, it strips it all away by section 14. No man or set of men can tell by this bill in its present form what it means because of section 14, which is inserted in it. Section 14 is taken out of the Hetch Hetchy bill.

A number of our western friends who do not believe that the General Government has or ought to have or exercise any power over water rights did want to pass the Hetch Hetchy bill, and after they had agreed upon all of its terms, probably as a compromise in that particular case, they inserted what is section 14 in this bill. Nobody knows what that meant in the Hetch Hetchy bill, but in most cases in the Hetch Hetchy bill the powers of the Government were defined definitely. In this case, having conferred or reserved those powers to the General Government, section 14 of this bill says:

That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation or for municipal or other uses or any vested right acquired thereunder.

Under the terms of this provision the Government may give the right to a company for a lease on a dam site to erect a power plant, and next year the State may take all the water rights away from the company. I am not in favor of giving to a State any such authority. Those rights which the States have which we can not constitutionally exercise we can not take away from them. They are reserved to the State notwithstanding any action that we take. I am not in favor of passing a bill by Congress and then determining upon its operation by laws heretofore or hereafter passed by a State. The provision says that any law that a State passes for any use of water shall prevail over this law. We have the power, we own the land on each side of the river of the national forests or elsewhere where water power can be produced, and we provide for its use and development by this bill, and do it, I think, very well, indeed. Then we put in section 14 as a compromise or a sop to some of our distinguished friends and take away the whole power we have conferred and leave it in the hands of the State. I do not think we ought to do that. I think that the power the General Government has it ought to exercise; the powers that the State governments have we ought not and can not take away from them. [Applause.]

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Illinois does not want to deliberately take away the vested rights of the Western States to the waters which our people own and are now using for irrigation of their growing crops, he would not offer this kind of an amendment. We know full well, and much better than he does, what it would mean to pass this bill without this section 14 in it. Practically every drop of the natural flow of the waters of every stream in every Western State to-day is appropriated and being beneficially used. It is appropriated by our citizens and under our State laws. It is appropriated under the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of our own States, and under the acts of Congress of 1866 and 1872. That water now by this bill is going to be hereafter allowed to be used by big and little power companies for power purposes.

We are not objecting to its being used for power purposes. It does not diminish the water as it falls down the mountain side and turns a wheel. But if you permit these power companies to take the water out of that stream and divert it from its use for irrigation and disregard the irrigators' rights, you simply destroy the vested rights of 40 years in the West. It would be a high-handed confiscation of our property rights. That is what it amounts to.

Take the reclamation law, to which the gentleman referred. When Congress passed it, on the 17th day of June, 1902, this provision in this language was put in that law. I took this language of section 14 from section 8 of the reclamation law and inserted it in this bill. That was put in there because it was necessary to protect the vested water rights of the West and nothing else, and nobody who respects the law or the vested rights of the settlers has ever from that day to this found any complaint with it; nobody has ever said the Government could not construct 32 reclamation projects in the West and operate them by virtue of that section being in there. It simply respects and protects the lawful rights of the farmers and miners and the inhabitants generally of the West.

When the forest reserves were set aside, when Congress passed the forest-reserve law, that same provision was put in to prevent strife and trouble. No honest man has ever found any fault with that. When we passed the Hetch Hetchy bill last year we put in this identical language to protect the vested water rights of the people of California, and nothing else. Water is used a great many times in the West. Many streams are 100 miles long. The irrigators will take the water out near the source of the stream and use it for irrigation and domestic purposes, and it will run back into the stream again and then be taken out again, and it will be used probably five or six times; but because the Government is going to turn a wheel with it some place, or give some corporation the right to do it, there is no reason why we should attempt in this act of Congress to legislate away the vested rights of those people that have been acquired under our Constitution and laws and the acts of Congress for years and years.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has confined his talk to irrigation, and so forth. Is the gentleman willing to accept an amendment to strike out the words "and other," in line 17?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; and I will tell you why. The waters under the constitutions of the Western States have three rights; the highest right is for domestic purposes, the second right is for irrigation purposes, and the third right is for manufacturing purposes. The first right includes municipal rights. I can not describe or go into all the different rights or uses of water in the West, but where they are appropriated on a stream for some beneficial use and are now being used, and the property and priority rights of the users are vested and recognized under the act of Congress and under our Constitution and State laws, Congress has no right to put in a provision here giving the Secretary of the Interior the right to go and interfere with and ruthlessly defy and destroy those rights. You would simply bring on interminable litigation if you try to trample upon those property rights. For the purpose of expressly declaring that Congress does not intend to give the power companies authority, as far as it can, if it can at all, to confiscate people's homes, this section was put in.

This section is all there is in this entire bill to protect the property rights of the western irrigators, and western domestic users, and western municipal users, and manufacturing users, or any other users we have in our public domain at the present time. And I certainly know we can not, without violating every right of decency, every vested constitutional and legal right of the Western States, cut out this section. It would be an infamous outrage to strike out this section 14, and I do not believe that Congress now, after all these years of legislation on water rights, is going to turn its back and brazenly pass a bill which means confiscation and nothing else. That is what this bill means without that section being in there. I want to again refer to the act of Congress of July 26, 1866 (Rev. Stat., 2339), as follows:

> Whenever, by priority of possession, rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural, manufacturing, or other purposes have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same; and the right of way for the construction of ditches and canals for the purposes herein specified is acknowledged and confirmed; but whenever any person, in the construction of any ditch or canal, injures or damages the possession of any settler on the public domain, the party committing such injury or damage shall be liable to the party injured for such injury or damage.

For the purpose of further guaranteeing and protecting the western settlers in their property rights and rights of way for their ditches and water rights, on July 9, 1870, Congress passed the following act:

> All patents granted or preemptions or homesteads allowed shall be subject to any vested and accrued water rights, or rights to ditches and reservoirs used in connection with such water rights as may have been acquired under or recognized by the preceding section. (Rev. Stat., 2340.)

Neither one of those acts has ever been repealed from that day to this. They were the foundation upon which many billions of dollars worth of property was made by many years of toil and privation, and upon which that property has securely rested for nearly a half a century.

On the 3d day of March, 1875, Congress passed the enabling act, permitting the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado to frame and submit its constitution for admission to the Union. Section 1 of the enabling act reads as follows:

> That the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado included in the boundaries hereinafter designated be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves, out of said Territory, a State government, with the name of the State of Colorado, which State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever, as hereinafter provided.

In pursuance of that enabling act the inhabitants of the Territory of Colorado adopted a constitution on the 14th of March, 1876, and submitted it. Paragraphs 5 and 6 of article 16 of that constitution which was submitted to this Government are as follows:

> Water public property: The water of every natural stream not heretofore appropriated within the State of Colorado is hereby declared to be the property of the public, and the same is dedicated to the use of the people of the State, subject to appropriation as hereinafter provided.
> Right of appropriation: The right to divert unappropriated waters of any natural stream for beneficial uses shall never be denied. Priority of appropriation shall give the better right as between those using the water for the same purpose, but when the waters of any natural stream are not sufficient for the service of all those desiring the use of the same, those using the water for domestic purposes shall have the preference over those claiming for any other purpose, and those using the water for agricultural purposes shall have the preference over those using the same for manufacturing purposes.

That constitution, with those provisions therein, was formally approved, and President Grant, on August 1, 1876, signed and issued the proclamation making Colorado the centennial State of this Union. That enabling act and those two provisions within our constitution were an absolutely binding and forever inviolate contract between this Government and the State of Colorado. Probably one-half of the property value of our entire State has been built and based upon those provisions. You of the East have little conception of what water rights mean to us of the West.

The act of June 4, 1897, establishing the forest reserves, also contained the following provision:

> The jurisdiction, both civil and criminal, over persons within such reservations shall not be affected or changed by reason of the existence of such reservations, except so far as the punishment of offenses against the United States therein is concerned, the intent and meaning of this provision being that the State wherein any such reservation is situated shall not, by reason of the establishment thereof, lose its jurisdiction, nor the inhabitants thereof their rights and privileges as citizens, or be absolved from their duties as citizens of the State.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46-118), and all of the other decisions of that court upon the subject during the past 40 years, have emphatically declared:

That the Government of the United States is one of enumerated powers; that it has no inherent powers of sovereignty; that the enumeration of the powers granted is to be found in the Constitution of the United States and in that alone; that all powers not granted are reserved to the people. While Congress has general legislative jurisdiction over the Territories and may control the flow of waters in their streams, it has no power to control a like flow within the limits of a State, except to preserve or improve the navigability of the stream; that the full control over those waters is vested in the State.

We have no navigable streams within the State of Colorado. The doctrine of riparian rights never did prevail in our country.

The language of section 8 of the reclamation act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat., 388), referred to, is as follows:

SEC. 8. That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State or Territory relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation, or any vested right acquired thereunder, and the Secretary of the Interior, in carrying out the provisions of this act, shall proceed in conformity with such laws, and nothing herein shall in any way affect any right of any State or of the Federal Government or of any landowner, appropriator, or user of water in, to, or from any interstate stream or the waters thereof: Provided, That the right to the use of water required under the provisions of this act shall be appurtenant to the land irrigated, and beneficial use shall be the basis, the measure, and the limit of the right.

I am going to insert as part of my remarks a portion of the appendix of the hearings upon this bill before the Public Lands Committee, being a part of Exhibit A, appearing on page 499 and following, in support of my position in opposition to this amendment, as follows:

EXHIBIT A.

MEMORANDUM IN SUPPORT OF RESOLUTION OF WESTERN GOVERNORS AT DENVER CONFERENCE, APRIL 9, 1914, RE CONSERVATION AND WATER POWERS.

At their conference at Denver on April 9, 1914, the governors of the States of Utah, Nevada, Colorado, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Wyoming, New Mexico, and North Dakota adopted the following resolution:

"Whereas Congress has declared the water of all lakes, rivers, and other sources of water supply upon the public lands, and not navigable, shall remain and be held free for the appropriation and use of the public for irrigation, mining, and manufacturing purposes, we insist the Federal Government has no authority to exercise control over the water of a State through ownership of public lands:

"Resolved, We maintain the waters of a State belong to the people of the State, and that the State should be left free to develop water-power possibilities and receive fully the revenues and other benefits derived from said developments.

"RESOLUTION ON CONSERVATION.

"We believe in conservation—in sane conservation. We believe the all-wise Creator placed the vast resources of this Nation here for the use and benefit of all the people, past, present, and future; and while we believe due consideration and protection should be given to the rights of those who come hereafter, we insist that the people of this day and age should be given every reasonable opportunity to develop our resources and put them to beneficial use."

There are pending before Congress two bills authorizing the development of water powers in the streams of the arid West—S. 4415, by Senator JONES, of Washington, and H. R. 14893, by Mr. FERRIS. Passing any general discussion of the merits of either of these bills in matters of detail, they present fundamentally antithetical divergence between State control of waters on the one hand and Federal control on the other, upon which the western governors so emphatically expressed themselves in the conference resolution above quoted, which may be concretely expressed in the question, Do the waters of the several States, or, more correctly, does the right to use those waters belong to the States or to the Federal Government?

This antithesis is expressed in the divergent provision of the two bills as to the compensatory tax to be imposed upon water-power developments. The Jones bill (sec. 2) provides for compensation to the Federal Government by a rental based upon the appraised value of the public lands required for the development. The Ferris bill (sec. 8) provides for rental based upon the power developed by the lessee at the site, regardless of the area of public lands occupied by him. In other words, the former asserts ownership of and exacts compensation for land taken, the latter of and for water independent of the land required for its use.

It is nowhere claimed that there is in the Federal Government any right to control the use of water within the States (except in aid of commerce and navigation and purposes incident to other governmental functions) except such as is given by the ownership of public lands.

This statement would seem to answer the question above stated, and to render the compensatory clause of the Ferris bill indefensible in principle. But it is claimed by the Federalists that the rights of the Government as a riparian owner of much of the land upon which hydroelectric developments must be made give it the riparian owner's right to the water or its use, and confer upon it a right to exact compensation for such use. In those few Western States in which a modified system of riparian rights is in force there would be merit in the contention were it not for the facts, first, that a riparian owner's usufructuary right to water is simply an incident of his riparian ownership of land—it may be severed by grant, reservation, or condemnation, or lost by prescription created by adverse user, but fundamentally and inherently it is appurtenant to his land, and if the land is rendered more valuable by its riparian character, it is compensated for in the increased cost of the land; second, the asserted right is not confined to riparian land, but is extended to nonriparian land which it for any reason becomes necessary to cross in the construction of development works—for example, a flume or pipe line may extend from a riparian lot in private ownership over nonriparian public land, and thence to a power house on private riparian land where it is returned to the stream; under the Ferris bill the Government may exact exactly the same tax or rental upon the same horsepower basis as though it were the owner of all the land, riparian or nonriparian, required for the development; third, the right is asserted as a sovereign, governmental right yielding a compensation to enable the Government to maintain a governmental bureau discharging governmental functions, and not a private proprietary right, constituting a thing of value and to be compensated for as such, upon its disposal, as other property is compensated for.

But in the great majority of Western States, where the doctrine of riparian rights has been rejected in toto, there is no basis either in sovereignty or riparian proprietorship for the assertion by the Federal Government of a right to the waters of streams, or their use, or to regulate their use by others, or to exact compensation for such use, but all of such claimed rights belong to the several States and their peoples, and are the subjects of property, distinct from any rights to land, riparian or otherwise, which may be used or required to make such water rights available. Furthermore, in no State can the Federal Government claim any rights to water except as incident to land ownership, and then only on the same terms and conditions as other owners of land in the State.

These propositions are elementary and part of the common knowledge of every citizen of the West, but seem to be so generally misunderstood by our eastern friends that this memorandum in support of the position so emphatically taken by the western governors is offered, citing, for brevity and conciseness, only the few leading and incontestable authorities on the proposition involved:

1. The Federal Government has, by reason of its ownership of public lands, no municipal right of sovereignty in the several States, but the rights of the public-land States over such lands, and the waters over the same, are in all respects equal to those of the original States over territory within their borders, save that they can not tax them or interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the Federal Government.

This principle is established, and incidentally the whole argument here made, in the leading case of Pollard's Lessee v. Haggen (3 How., 212, 15 U. S., 391), where, among other things, the court said:

"We think a proper examination of this subject will show that the United States never held any municipal sovereignty, jurisdiction, or right of soil in and to the territory of which Alabama or any of the new States were formed, except for temporary purposes, and to execute the trusts created by the acts of the Virginia and Georgia Legislatures, and the deeds of cession executed by them to the United States, and the trust created by the treaty with the French Republic of the 30th of April, 1803, ceding Louisiana.

* * * * * * *

"And if an express stipulation had been inserted in the agreement granting the municipal right or sovereignty and eminent domain to the United States such stipulation would have been void and inoperative, because the United States have no constitutional capacity to exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain within the limits of a State, or elsewhere, except in the cases in which it is expressly granted.

* * * * * * *

"The right of Alabama and every other new State to exercise all the powers of government which belong to and may be exercised by the original States of the Union must be admitted and remain unquestioned, except so far as they are temporarily deprived of control over the public lands.

* * * * * * *

"We therefore think the United States hold the public lands within the new States by force of the deeds of cession and the statutes connected with them, and not by any municipal sovereignty which it may be supposed they possess or have reserved by compact with the new States for that particular purpose. The provision of the Constitution above referred to shows that no such power can be exercised by the United States within a State. Such a power is not only repugnant to the Constitution, but it is inconsistent with the spirit and intention of the deeds of cession.

* * * * * * *

"By the preceding course of reasoning we have arrived at these general conclusions: First, the shores of navigable waters and the soils under them were not granted by the Constitution to the United States but were reserved to the States respectively. Second, the new States have the same rights, sovereignty, and jurisdiction over this subject as the original States. Third, the right of the United States to the public lands, and the power of Congress to make all needful rules and regulations for the sale and disposition thereof, conferred no power to grant to the plaintiffs the land in controversy in this case."

The principle announced in this case has been affirmed and the case followed in cases in the Supreme Court of the United States and in the several States too numerous to mention. Among the more important cases of those most nearly in point here are: Withers v. Buckley (20 How., 84); Shively v. Bowlby (152 U. S., 1); Fort Leavenworth R. Co. v. Lowe (114 U. S., 525); Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46); Hudson Water Co. v. McCarter (209 U. S., 349).

In the Fort Leavenworth case it is said:

"The United States, therefore, retained, after the admission of the State, only the rights of an ordinary proprietor, except as an instrument for the execution of the powers of the General Government, that part of the tract which was actually used for a fort or military post was beyond such control of the State by taxation or otherwise as would defeat its use for those purposes. So far as the land constituting the reservation was not used for military purposes the possession of the United States was only that of an individual proprietor. The State could have exercised with reference to it the same authority and jurisdiction which she could have exercised over similar property held by private parties."

In Kansas v. Colorado (supra), which is now perhaps the leading case on this proposition as applied to the arid States, the following statement is made:

"As to those lands within the limits of the States, at least of the Western States, the National Government is the most considerable owner and has power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting its propriety. We do not mean that its legislation can override State laws in respect to the general subject of reclamation. While arid lands are to be found mainly, if not only, in the Western and newer States, yet the powers of the National Government within the limits of those States are the same—no greater and no less—than those within the limits of the original 13, and it would be strange if, in the absence of a definite grant of power, the National Government could enter the territory of the States along the Atlantic and legislate in respect to improving by irrigation or otherwise the lands within their borders. Nor do we understand that hitherto Congress has acted in disregard to this limitation."

And in the Hudson Water case the court, through Mr. Justice Holmes, says:

"It appears to us that few public interests are more obviously indisputable and independent of particular theory than the interest of the public of a State to maintain the rivers that are wholly within it substantially undiminished except by such drafts upon them as the guardian of the public welfare may permit for the purpose of turning them to more perfect use."

And it is held that no agreement of riparian owners can sanction the diversion of an important stream outside the boundaries of the State. In this discussion the court expressly excludes irrigation problems.

II. The right of sovereignty over lands and waters being in the several States, each may determine for itself the law governing the right to the use of its waters and the manner of acquiring and conditions of continuing such use.

Whatever may have been the rule during the early formative period of irrigation and water-power law, the Supreme Court of the United States has consistently held since the decision of Kansas v. Colorado cited above, that the nature and extent of water rights within the several States is a question of local law in which the statutes and decisions of those States govern.

In the Kansas v. Colorado case it said—

"Each State has full jurisdiction over the lands within its borders, including the beds of streams and other waters."

And—

"It may determine for itself whether the common-law rule in respect to riparian rights or that doctrine which obtains in the arid regions of the West what appropriation of waters for the purposes of irrigation shall control. Congress can not enforce either rule upon any State."

This rule is substantially announced in the Hudson Water case, above cited, and in Boquillas Cattle Co. case (213 U. S., 339), an appropriation in Arizona is expressly sustained as against a claim of vested riparian rights claimed under a Territorial statute making the common law of England, so far as not repugnant to the Territorial laws adopted—the court, through Mr. Justice Holmes, merely saying trenchantly: "But we agree with the Territorial court that, considered with the rest of the code, it is far from meaning that the patentees of a ranch on the San Pedro are to have the same rights as the owners of an estate on the Thames." The proprietor's rights are sustained under the Arizona appropriation code.

The question is expressly decided again in Los Angeles Milling Co. v. Los Angeles (217 U. S., 217), where it is held that the decision of the California court as to the effect of rights of the Pueblo of Los Angeles to water, basing its decision on previous decisions of the court of California, presented no Federal question which the Supreme Court could review, citing, among other cases, Los Angeles v. Hooker (188 U. S., 314), where Chief Justice Fuller said:

"Obviously, the question as to the title or right of plaintiffs in error to the land and whatever appertained thereto was one of State law, on which the decision of the State court was final."

In Shodde v. Twin Falls Water Co. (224 U. S., 107) the Idaho law of appropriation is sustained against a claim of vested riparian rights, and the question is treated by the Supreme Court solely as one of local law under which the decisions of the State court are binding.

III. In the great majority of Western States water is declared the property of the State or of the public and the right to its use the subject of appropriation independent of land ownership; title to riparian land gives no title to water nor right to its use.

In the arid States the above statement is known as the Colorado doctrine, being first promulgated in the case of Coffin v. Lefthand Ditch Co. (6 Colo., 443). In this case the court, after reviewing the doctrines of prior appropriation and of riparian rights, said:

"We conclude, then, that the common-law doctrine giving the riparian owner a right to the flow of water in its natural channel upon and over his land, even though he makes no beneficial use thereof, is inapplicable to Colorado. The imperative necessity, unknown to the countries which gave it birth, compels the recognition of another doctrine in conflict therewith. And we hold that, in the absence of express statutes to the contrary, the first appropriator of water from a natural stream for a beneficial purpose has, with the qualifications contained in the Constitution, a prior right thereto to the extent of such appropriation."

This view of the law has been adopted, in addition to Colorado, in Wyoming, New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Idaho, and Nevada, and as hereinbefore noted, is acquiesced in by the Supreme Court of the United States. The leading decisions in the various States are: Willey v. Decker (11 Wyo., 496), Clough v. Wayne (2 Ariz., 371), Stowell v. Johnson (7 Utah, 215), Drake v. Earhart (2 Idaho, 750), Reno Smelting Works v. Stevenson (20 Nev., 269).

There is not space to review these decisions in detail, but they all proceed upon the theory expounded in the Colorado case—that the law of riparian rights was not adapted to the situation existing in the arid States, and consequently never was a part of their law; that their law originated independently of the common-law doctrines out of the customs of miners and as a product of necessity, which, if not recognized, would have left those States a waste. Unlike the States which followed the California doctrine, next to be mentioned, they do not hold that rights to the use of water depend in any sense upon either acquiescence by or grant from the Federal Government as the owner of riparian lands, but that those rights are sui generis and of independent local origin, and as such are impressed upon the lands of the United States as well as upon lands which have passed into private ownership.

IV. In the balance of the Western States while riparian rights are recognized such recognition is of rights of land proprietorship and not of sovereignty, and it has not been extended to public lands because of any paramount governmental ownership as such, but because of the proprietary interest of the Government, which, as proprietor, is regarded simply as the source of title.

This doctrine, known as the California doctrine, prevails in the States of California, Washington, and Montana. Under it the ownership of riparian land is regarded as carrying with it, as at common law, the right to the use of water; but the Government, as the owner of such land, is held to have granted its rights to water by the now famous act of July 26, 1866, which, among other things, provides:

"SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That whenever, by priority of possession, rights to the use of water for mining, agricultural manufacturing, or other purposes, have vested and accrued, and the same are recognized and acknowledged by the local customs, laws, and the decisions of courts, the possessors and owners of such vested rights shall be maintained and protected in the same."

This act was early held to be not only a recognition of rights previously acquired, but also as a grant by the Federal Government to future users of water, and it has been generally held under it when applied to this doctrine that so long as land was in public ownership of the United States water rights could be acquired by appropriation, because of the grant of the right so to do by the act of Congress, but as soon as they passed into a private ownership riparian rights, unless previously divested, attached.

The leading case in support of this doctrine is Lux v. Haggin (69 Cal., 255). The decision is a very long one. It is there held that the Government has the absolute title to its lands, and that consequently, unless preserved, running waters appurtenant thereto pass by grant or patent of the United States (p. 340). But it is further said:

"Upon the admission of California into the Union, this State became vested with all the rights of sovereignty and jurisdiction in and over navigable water and the soils under them which were possessed by the original States after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. Since the admission of California into the Union the public lands of the United States (except such as have been reserved or purchased for forts, navy yards, public buildings, etc.) are held as are the lands of private persons, except that they can not be taxed by the State, nor can the primary disposition of them be interfered with" (p. 335).

Similarly the Federal court for California, in Woodruff v. North Bloomfield (18 Fed. Cas., 772; 9 Sawyer, 441), held that after the admission of California "the only interest of the United States in the public lands was that of a proprietor, like that of any other proprietor, except that a State, under the express terms upon which it was admitted, could pass no laws to interfere with their primary disposal, and they were not subject to taxation."

The doctrine of Lux v. Haggin (supra) has been adopted in Washington in Kendel v. Joyce (48 Wash., 489), and in Montana in Cottonwood v. Thom (39 Mont., 115).

It is clear that in these States, while a title to waters running through and over the public lands is recognized in the Federal Government, this title is merely one of proprietary ownership and not a right of sovereignty; that it does not give the Federal Government the right to regulate as a sovereign the development and use of its waters, but it, as the owner of riparian land, is looked to simply as the source of title to the waters as well as to the lands, which it is held by the act of 1866 it has parted with and dedicated to the people of the States.

A theory somewhat different from either of the others prevails in Oregon and should be briefly mentioned. Until 1909 it was generally accepted that a modified system of riparian rights prevailed in Oregon, but in that year in the exhaustive and learned decision in Hough v. Porter (51 Oreg., 882), (rehearing opinion) it is held that that provision of the desert-land act of March 3, 1877, that "all surplus water over and above such actual appropriation and use, together with the waters of all lakes, rivers, and other sources of water supply upon the public lands, and not navigable, shall remain and be held free for the appropriation and use of the public for irrigation, mining, and manufacturing purposes, subject to existing rights," constitutes a dedication to the public by the riparian owner, the Federal Government, of all rights to waters otherwise appurtenant to the public lands. This decision was said by Mr. Justice Holmes in Boquillas Cattle Co. v. Curtis (supra) to stand "on plausible grounds."

Thus it appears that of the distinctively arid States, seven deny absolutely any right in the Federal Government to their waters, three refer to the Federal Government as a source of title by virtue of its riparian ownership and the grant contained in the act of 1866, and one holds that the Federal Government, while originally the source of title, has irrevocably dedicated its waters to the public; and the Supreme Court of the United States has left the question to the States themselves as one of local law.

It should be noted before closing that all the right-of-way statutes grant rights of way over public lands. None of them since the act of 1866 have purported to grant, thus impliedly claiming title to, any right to use waters flowing over the lands, and the administration of the right-of-way acts has to this day related solely to land titles and permits and not to water rights. There has thus never been any claim by Congress of any right to waters.

CONCLUSION.

What has gone before is an abstract discussion of a purely legal question. As said at the outset, there is no purpose to consider in detail the proposed legislation or to differentiate the two measures before Congress. With a few changes in matter of detail there would not be a great practical difference between them. Either would go a long ways to further and encourage the development of water powers for all the people with adequate safeguards of their rights and protection against the exploitation of water powers for the benefit of private individuals.

But the States can not surrender the principle involved in the declaration of their governors. To do so would be to acknowledge their inequality with the original States in opposition to the equality guaranteed by the Constitution and by the acts of their admission; it would be to surrender without consideration one of their greatest resources; it would be to admit the right of the Federal Government to tax their resources and their people for the benefit of the whole Nation, when the people of other States are not likewise taxed; it would mean to admit the principle of Federal regulation of a matter of purely local concern; it would be a confession of inability to solve for themselves their own problems.

For the Federal Government to secure compensation either in the way of purchase price or annual rental for their lands, with all the value which such lands have, whether by reason of acknowledged riparian rights, strategic position, or otherwise, the people of the West will agree to. They will be just and even generous in this regard. But to surrender a vital principle of their sovereignty, to submit to a tax based on might and not on right, they will never agree.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the expiration of 30 minutes all debate on this amendment and amendments thereto be closed.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I have no objection to running on, but I shall make a point of no quorum at 5 o'clock. It is a hot day, and I think we ought to make it a practice to quit at 5 o'clock when there is no special reason for running on.

Mr. FERRIS. I had hoped that we might get through to the one section that we passed over, so that we would have only that one thing remaining.

Mr. MANN. We can get through Saturday, and that is all we can do anyhow, probably. I do not object to the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment be closed in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which has been offered ought not to be adopted, and yet it is a perfectly logical amendment from the standpoint of the other provisions of the bill; and no man who has voted for the provisions of this bill right straight through can find any justification for voting against this amendment, because if this provision in the bill is effective the balance of the bill is not effective. If the balance of the bill is effective, then this provision is not effective. This is the position in which the gentlemen find themselves. They have voted and argued for a bill taking from the Western Commonwealths, or attempting to take from them, every right they have over the control of waters within their borders.

They have supported a bill which proposes to take from those Commonwealths the right to regulate the rates and the charges of power development from water which belongs to the people of the States and ought to be under their control; and yet when they come to the real test, of course they hesitate. They want to seem to preserve the rights of the States which they have thrown away—frittered away, cast aside, trampled upon, flaunted.

The only trouble about this provision is that it is not complete enough and far-reaching enough, and I shall offer an amendment to broaden its provisions. It is not as good a provision as that contained in the irrigation law, which, by the way, I had the honor of drawing. It is not as broad and all-embracing a provision, but with a slight amendment, including the word "power," it will do very well. But when gentlemen who are supporting the bill from regions other than the country in which it operates say this section ought to be taken out of the bill in order to make it logical and consistent, they are entirely right about it.

You have here a measure that in 11 sections makes all the Western States provinces, cantons, of the Federal Government, which takes or attempts to take from the people of those States all the rights they have under the Constitution over the waters that flow within their borders and over the development of local enterprise within their borders.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wyoming yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. MONDELL. And it is entirely logical to carry the thing forward to its conclusion if you are in favor of the other provisions for which you voted. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a fact that section 14 will obviate every possible conflict or trouble, for as a matter of fact the waters belong to the States anyhow?

Mr. MONDELL. Of course the waters belong to the States. I should say that the gentlemen who have accepted the provisions of the bill, surrendering all the rights of the States, so far as their acts can have that effect, seek to apply this soothing balm to their souls and consciences. Perhaps they hope that these federalistic provisions would not turn out as bad as they seem, and in any event that their constitutents will read only this particular section and thus think they were preserving their rights. I can not think of any other logical reason for putting the provision in such a bill.

Of course it ought to stay. It is one of the few provisions in the bill that ought to be enacted into law. If the other objectionable provisions were stricken out of the bill, however, this would not be entirely necessary. But this should stand, no matter what else falls. But gentlemen who have stood by the bill hard and fast will be voting logically if they vote to strike out this section, because they have given away all the rights of the States, and if they could be saved only by this declaration they would not be saved at all. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, section 14 of this act does what is done in the original reclamation act, as referred to by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], of date July 17, 1902. Section 8 of that act provides as follows:

> That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect or in any way interfere with the laws of any State or Territory relating to the control, appropriation, use, or disposition of water used in irrigation, or in any vested right acquired thereunder.

Now, that was put in there for a purpose, and it had its proper effect. In what is known as the Hetch Hetchy bill, which was approved on December 19, 1913, section 11 contained the following provision:

> That this act is a grant upon certain express conditions specially set forth herein, and nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect or in any way to interfere with the laws of the State of California relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation or for municipal or other purposes, or any vested right acquired thereunder.

Now, this provision of the bill—section 14—is almost entirely in the language of the act known as the Hetch Hetchy act. It is generally conceded by all that the waters belong to the States. The National Government is not dealing in this bill with water or water rights that it does not control; and when Congress passed the reclamation law it put in this provision, so as to make it plain and clear that the National Government was not attempting or intending in any way to legislate upon water rights over which it did not pretend to have any control. It is the same way with respect to the Hetch Hetchy bill and the desert-land law. This Government gave unlimited right, gave away practically its right as a riparian owner. That is where we are confusing ourselves many times. The National Government wherein it has not waived its riparian rights to its private lands stands in the same position as a private individual owning and holding title in fee as to the riparian rights of his land in regard to the streams flowing through it or over it.

And in this bill where there is a riparian right and the Government deals with a tract of land, of course it will deal with it the same as a private individual deals with his. But the real purpose and object of the bill is a grant or a lease, upon condition that if you use Government land for certain purposes or lease it for certain purposes you must do certain things.

Now, this bill does not intend to legislate in regard to water rights. It does not intend to affect priority of the use of water or priority of use of the riparian rights of the stream, which may be a reasonable right, or use for domestic purposes and household purposes, or for irrigation and manufacturing, and other purposes if it becomes necessary; and the placing of this section in the bill, the same as in the Hetch Hetchy bill, and in the reclamation law, is to leave it plain and clear that there is to be no confusion, that there is to be no intermingling of rights, and that not one can contend that there is to be any intermingling or confusion of rights. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has well stated that to strike out this provision of the bill is a sort of deathblow to the general arrangement of the bill. Of course, I take it for granted that he is opposed to the bill and would like to see it defeated, but he realizes that the bill is going to pass. He realizes that two-thirds or four-fifths of the membership of this House are in favor of some legislation upon this great subject. He realizes that his country and the West generally have been tied up for the last 10 years upon the question of reservations and that there has been no proper development of the water powers, such as there ought to be, when men have been ready and willing with their talents, with their brains, with their engineers, and their money to develop great enterprises, to the end that the surrounding country may be developed. He realizes that that has been the condition, and he realizes that there ought to be some law so that this condition may be changed. The gentleman believes it ought to be sale outright and not a lease.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Suppose the State of Colorado has laws governing the use of water for the development of power, which laws vary materially from the rules and regulations set out in this act, which would govern, the State law or this law?

Mr. RAKER. In answer to the gentleman's question, as I view it, and as we are trying to arrange it, the State law in regard to water rights, in regard to acquisition, and in regard to use, ought to remain in the State, where it now is. And if there is any possibility of the Government having any control of it, it ought not to have any, because it is practically recognized by all that the water right and its control is a State function, the property of the State. You get your water right from the State.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Let me understand. You answer that question, then, by saying that the State law would control?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Then if the State has full power under this act to make all the conditions and all the laws it sees fit about the development of the water power and the use of the water on Government lands, I see no use for this law, under which the National Government undertakes to define the way in which it shall be used.

Mr. RAKER. We leave it without any question that the title, the handling, and the disposition shall remain in the State, and that there shall be no attempt to confuse the jurisdiction. I want to call the attention of the gentleman to this fact, that in the reclamation act that was passed on June 17, 1902, there is the same provision.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Not the same provision. The gentleman read it. It referred merely to irrigation. But you have got in here "or other uses," which covers the use of water for the development of power. It seems to give the State the authority to make laws governing the development of water power on these Government lands. The words "or other uses" ought to be stricken from this section.

Mr. RAKER. The Hetch Hetchy act is almost word for word like this. The provision in the general reclamation act is a little different. But let me call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that this provision is in the reclamation act, and when the Government attempts to obtain a water right under the reclamation law for its reservoirs, for its dams, and for its irrigation projects it goes into the State and files its application for a water right, and commences the construction of the dam and ditches, just the same as a private individual, and its right is determined and disposed of under the same law as though the gentleman himself had gone into the State of California, or Oregon, or Nevada, and applied for a water right. There is no question about it; it is conceded by all; it is conceded by the Attorney General in voluminous opinions filed with the Secretary of the Interior that these water rights belong to the State.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Can it be taken away constitutionally by the National Government?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No.

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. I do not see, then, that there is any need of the provision if they belong to the State and can not be taken away.

[Mr. KINKAID of Nebraska addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will not prevail. I am not a lawyer, and therefore I can not engage in a legal discussion of water-right powers acquired by the State from the Federal Government and belonging to its citizens, but we of the West recognize fully and forcibly the great damage that would come to the development of agricultural interests if these water rights were not respected, and if those who are already enjoying such rights were not protected to the fullest extent.

The character of many of our streams makes it necessary that reservoirs should be constructed in order that water may be stored at certain seasons of the year in order to provide a sufficient flow for power purposes. There are some streams along which, if this bill becomes a law, power plants will undoubtedly be constructed, where at certain seasons there will be a flow of as much as 2,000 cubic feet per second and at other seasons it may be reduced to 600 cubic feet per second or even less. I can conceive of a situation arising under which a power company might stop the flow of the stream entirely to the great injury of farmers in order to procure for itself sufficient power by storing the water in one or more of the numerous reservoirs connected with its system and necessary to its operation. There must be some limitation put upon the rights of the power corporation as far as the use of water is concerned. If this is not provided for in this bill, there will immediately arise an interminable conflict between the owners of water rights within these public-land States and the owners of these proposed power plants. The question presented in this section is simply this, that Congress here declares that the use of water for irrigation and domestic purposes and for any other purpose which has been lawfully granted by the State under its constitutional power shall supersede the rights granted in this bill. If we adopt the amendment now before us, we will create a condition that will produce a conflict of jurisdiction between the Federal Government and the States and give rise to an unending course of litigation.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if this law is to be of any force and effect, those who desire to avail themselves of its provisions can readily, through the purchase of water rights on streams and rivers where power plants are to be constructed and operated, satisfy the requirements of the State laws. They can readily prevent any conflict of authority and can secure for themselves a permanent source of power supply by purchasing sufficient water rights, and thus protect themselves from any damage that might arise to individuals, corporations, or municipalities. The amendment which the gentleman from Illinois has proposed, in my judgment, will inevitably prevent the successful operation of this law.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is it not true that what we of the West are trying to accomplish by this section is that when a power company comes into our State and establishes a power plant, it will find 95 per cent of all the water of the State already appropriated under State law, and it must not, because Uncle Sam is behind it, expect to ride roughshod over these people? A power company must come in and put itself on the same footing and equality with other appropriators of water and make an appropriation under our laws so that those that are ahead will be ahead of water-power companies authorized under this act; and those who are behind will be behind the new power company; in other words, they will have to come in on an equality with all other water users and acquire and use their water rights under our State water-right laws and under the acts of Congress and laws by which those rights were acquired.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. The gentleman is right. The power company will have to come in and conform to the laws of the State. You can come into the State of Colorado and find any number of power sites along our streams. I can take you through many of our canyons and you will find any number of sites available for water-power plants.

In order to develop your power scheme properly you would have to go up into the parks and valleys where settlers have been living for many years and construct reservoirs and provide the necessary storage facilities in order to have a constant and steady flow of water. The conditions are not the same in our State that exist in other States where they are traversed by large navigable rivers with an unending flow.

The passage of this amendment strikes a vital blow to the agricultural development of the great public-land States. If our water rights are all to be made subordinate to the power rights of corporations yet unorganized the value of nearly every acre of irrigable land will be affected, and the enlargement of present irrigation projects and the undertaking of new enterprises will be absolutely retarded and made impossible. There must be some clear and definite declaration made in this legislation that Congress does not intend to question the right of the State to control the waters of the State. The powers and privileges granted by this act must be subject to this recognition, and the presence of this section in the bill is necessary to inform all intending lessees of water-power sites under Federal jurisdiction that while they can operate under Federal law as far as the land is concerned, as far as securing rights of way are concerned, and in furnishing power to localities in one or more States, yet when they come to the use and appropriation of water that they must recognize the laws of the State as superior to any Federal grant.

We find in the provisions of this bill many points of conflict between Federal and State authority. We recognize the difficulty confronting its framers in attempting to work out a plan of Federal ownership and operation of power resources located within the boundaries of a sovereign State. We contend that the problem of protecting the rights of the Government and the people would be more readily and properly solved by giving to the States the power to regulate and control the development of power companies within their borders, thereby preventing any conflict whatever between the State and the Federal Government.

The operation of hydroelectric power companies does not present any complicated problem that can not be regulated by State law. The people are well informed in these days of the dangers and abuses of monopolies. They are protecting themselves by municipal, State, and national legislation. The Government with all of its national obligations can well afford to relieve itself of responsibilities and powers that can be more satisfactorily exercised by the States. This legislation is in line with the resistless tendency of the day to widen every sphere of national activity, to brush aside every prerogative of State sovereignty, and bring the individual in his private and corporate capacity into direct relationship with the Federal Government.

No better illustration of this tendency can be presented than this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. He would disregard the vested rights of our farmers and municipalities to the use of water within the State in order to confer a prior right to a corporation on the public domain. There is enough danger in the proposed amendment as far as it affects future development of agriculture without taking into account the irreparable damage to interests already developed. We have a right to demand that the Government shall observe the rights which it has heretofore conferred upon the States. The Government is now embarking upon a program of leasing operations. We are to create a Federal landlord and we are bidding for tenants to furnish electric power, to open coal mines, to dig oil wells, and operate other natural resources. The advocates of this policy realize that their claim for popular approval largely depends in scaring the people into the belief that the Federal Government is the only bulwark that stands between the forces of monopoly and the interests of the people.

They forget that if there has been any waste of natural resources, if there has been any spoliation of national wealth on the public domain, that such waste and loss were brought about when the control of the Government over these resources was just as strong as it is to-day. I have a strong belief in the ability and power of the American people to protect themselves against monopoly wherever it appears to work out its baneful purpose. If the citizen is to be taught that the power of monopoly can only be overthrown through Federal agencies, will there not be a weakening of all the powers of local government that should be employed in protecting and defending his rights?

Should we not rather strengthen these powers than weaken them? We can not fortify them by taking from them by Federal legislation their proper powers and responsibilities. We should respect their rightful functions of government, and in the exercise of these there will come strength and efficiency of administration. The Government must be fortified at every point. Its local units must discharge the powers properly belonging to them; the city and the State must fulfill the obligations resting upon them, and in so doing the Nation will be given those large national undertakings that will develop the highest and most efficient qualities of statesmanship and contribute in every way to the happiness and welfare of the citizen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FITZGERALD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16673, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TOWNSEND, for five days, on account of illness.

To Mr. A. MITCHELL PALMER, for one week, on account of illness.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of the merchant marine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FERRIS. Under the rule we do not go ahead with the power bill, do we?

The SPEAKER. That would be owing to whether or not the Committee on War Claims had business it desires to consider.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow is war-claims day, and under the rule, under the ruling which the Speaker made a few days ago, this bill could not come up.

The SPEAKER. Suppose that committee had nothing to do?

Mr. MANN. That would not make any difference. This bill could not come up, because it is not given any privileged status on Friday under the ruling of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes that the Committee on War Claims will have business which it desires to consider.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 11740. An act to amend an act entitled "An act creating a legislative assembly in the Territory of Alaska and conferring legislative power thereon, and for other purposes," approved August 24, 1912.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, August 21, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Our heavenly Father, we thank Thee for all the instrumentalities that have been provided for the advancement of Thy cause. We thank Thee for the church and for all that it has accomplished for mankind. Grant to sanctify all its agencies for the consummation of Thy purposes in the earth. The passing of the head of a great Christian church, whose sympathetic heart rose to the point of grief for the turmoil of the nations, has brought a new sorrow to multitudes. We thank Thee for his charitable heart and for all the good influences that have gone out from his life. We pray for the divine consolation upon all those who mourn his departure. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Wednesday, August 19, 1914, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 5673. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911;

S. 6315. An act to authorize the Great Western Land Co., of Missouri, to construct a bridge across Black River;

H. R. 14155. An act to amend an act of Congress approved March 28, 1900 (vol. 31, Stat. L., p. 52), entitled "An act granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing an experiment station of the Kansas State Agricultural College and a western branch of the State Normal School thereon, and for a public park; and

H. J. Res. 246. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to grant a revocable license for the use of lands adjoining the national cemetery near Nashville, Tenn., for public-road purposes.

MONTANA STATE CELEBRATION.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, at this season the people of Montana are having a celebration the national importance of which has attracted the attention of the press of the country. I send to the desk and ask to have read an editorial from one of the leading papers of New England.

There being no objection, the Secretary read as follows:

Montana is celebrating this week her 25 years of statehood and half century of existence since in the midst of her gold discoveries and frontier disorders she was set up as a Territory. The other States of the Union may well join in the felicitations. Not exactly unique, indeed typical of the States that have been carved out of the great region that was not so long ago rated a vast desert, the story of her growth has every charm of romance of the rugged sort which the former frontier of America developed for the world's entertainment. In the midst of her great hills and deep canyons, her wealth of mines and her once arid but now productive plains, her tumbling rivers and her climate of extremes, she has been built up into a Commonwealth with all the vigor of the western kind, writing the pioneership of her habit into the laws that work out experiments in democracy for mankind's instruction.

Nothing has been lacking in the development of the great State of the Northwest which picturesqueness could demand. The inrush of the miners in the period of the war for the Union, the battling with the elements, the upturning of the richest veins of metal, the contest with the Indians that gave her the battle field that will longest be remembered, where Custer led his little troop, the conquering of lands by the turning of the rivers into irrigation ditches, the encounters of primitive politics, and the emerging into a small empire, not so small, with all the equipment of modern progress, well-built towns, university, agriculture by machinery, and mining reduced to a well-ordered industry, all these aid in the occasion for her jubilee.

With hardly one man to a hundred square miles of territory when given its first government in 1864, and grown to only 39,000 population in 1880, Montana became a State 10 years later with 143,000, grew to 376,000 in 1910, and must be approaching the half million, which in turn is but a mark on the way to the great population she is capable of maintaining. More than $32,000,000 has been spent on irrigation of the million acres that are thus made fertile. The mining products have mounted to over $50,000,000 in a year. Resources are still in process of discovery, while the falls of her many streams are not yet in harness to do their possible work. The population, once largely foreign, is now native in as large a proportion as that of Massachusetts, and illiteracy has been reduced to less than 5 per cent of the people of 10 years and over in age. These are items in the list of achievements that mark the progress of an American State from the roughest of raw material to a greatness none may estimate. (Christian Science Monitor, Aug. 15, 1914.)

Mr. WALSH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

TERRITORIAL INTEGRITY OF CHINA.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit a resolution with a memorandum attached. The memorandum need not be read, but I ask that the resolution be read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The resolution (S. Res. 445) was read and, with the accompanying memorandum, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as follows:

Whereas recent developments point to the extension into the regions of the Far East of the existing armed conflict of Europe: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the United States reaffirms its attitude as to the territorial integrity of China, and renews its adherence to the principle of the "open door" in that Republic; and be it further

Resolved, That the United States could not view with indifference any suggestion looking to the alteration of the existing territorial status quo of the islands of the Pacific and Oceania or to any change in the character of their present occupation and settlement.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

Mr. SMOOT. From the Committee on Finance I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (S. 6261) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase not exceeding 25,000,000 ounces of silver bullion, and for other purposes. As it is an emergency matter, I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I was one of the subcommittee to which the bill was referred for consideration. I understand that there was no formal written report by the committee, and I therefore want to take this opportunity to voice my sentiment against the bill. While I have agreed not to oppose its present consideration, I shall ask for an explanation of it, and I may myself have something to say upon the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will simply say that the bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to anticipate the requirements of the Treasury for silver bullion for the subsidiary coinage. The bill originally provided for the purchase of 25,000,000 ounces. It has been thought that 15,000,000 ounces would be ample to purchase to keep the mines of the West in operation. There are produced in the United States about sixty to sixty-five million ounces of silver each year. Under the present law there are some three or four million ounces of silver purchased by the United States and used in the coinage of subsidiary coin. That is purchased every year now by the Government in the open market.

The bill simply anticipates the requirements of the Government and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to purchase up to 15,000,000 ounces within the coming six months.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SMOOT. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah why the Government should buy silver any more than it should buy wheat or any other product of the American people?

Mr. SMOOT. Silver is now and always has been used by our Government as a part of her monetary system. It is being used in all parts of the United States. I see a difference between purchasing silver and purchasing wheat, and if——

Mr. BRISTOW. It is all right to purchase silver if we need it; but why purchase a lot of silver because of the dull market for it now, any more than to purchase anything else that there is a dull market for?

Mr. SMOOT. The situation in Europe to-day, on account of the war, is such that there is not a present demand for silver, but there will be, I have no doubt, before very long. The Senator knows that in war times particularly there is a demand for silver by the different Governments; but at the present time the financial situation in the world is so upset and the transportation of it is so interfered with that there can not be the sale of silver bullion that ordinarily takes place in the regular course of business.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is not that true of every other American product where we have a surplus? Is it not true of wheat, and is it not true of everything else that we have to sell? Why should silver mining be selected as the special industry that we should go out and buy its product? Why not buy some cotton?

Mr. SMOOT. We have done and are doing everything in our power to pass laws, since the European war began, to facilitate the transportation of wheat and cotton and other products, and the Senator should not object to this bill, and I sincerely trust he will not do so.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think the bill ought to go over.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the bill goes over I wish to ask——

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if he will not withdraw his objection?

Mr. BRISTOW. I will not. There is no reason why we should pass the bill post haste.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection, and that ends it for the present. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BLACK WARRIOR RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. BANKHEAD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 181) authorizing the Secretary of War to permit the contractor for building locks on Black Warrior River to proceed with the work without interruption to completion, and I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. BURTON. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask that the joint resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War may, in his discretion, on the recommendation of the Chief of Engineers, permit the contractor for building Locks and Dam No. 17, on Black Warrior River, to proceed with the work specified in the contract made in pursuance of the act of Congress approved August 22, 1911, and to carry the said work to completion without interruption on account of the exhaustion of available funds, it being understood that the contractor is to rely upon future appropriations for payment, and that no payment for said work will be made until funds shall have been provided and made available therefor by Congress.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to have the permission of the Senate to explain the joint resolution. It will require only three minutes if I may get unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BURTON. I shall object to that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Am I to understand that the Senator from Ohio objects?

Mr. BURTON. I object. The Black Warrior River improvement is in just the same position with a number of other improvements. A provision of this kind is entirely without a precedent.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I object to the Senator making an explanation if he will not permit me to explain the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If it is asked that the joint resolution go over, it goes over.

Mr. BURTON. I have no objection to allowing the Senator from Alabama to make a statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no objection, the Senator from Alabama has permission to proceed.

Mr. BURTON. But I shall object to the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the situation is this: The Government of the United States has expended up to this time more than $10,000,000 improving the Warrior, the Bigbee, and the Black Warrior Rivers in order that the coal fields of Alabama might be reached and the products transported to the Gulf. Lock 17 referred to in the joint resolution is the last lock of the system. The contract price is $2,500,000. It is a lock 62 feet high and creates a pool above it right through the heart of the coal fields for 50 miles. The lock is now practically completed. The contractor has 500 men employed; he has material on hand that has been accepted by the Government for its completion; he has a railroad for at least 16 miles, which was necessary to transport material for the building of the lock. He is under a $500,000 bond for the completion of the lock by the first of January next.

If the work is to be suspended it will necessarily delay the completion of this great work for practically 12 months. The contractor comes forward and says the appropriation is exhausted. We do not ask for a dollar of appropriation in this joint resolution. We would not come into the Senate and ask that an exception be made in this case, but we do come in here and permit the contractor at his own risk and his own expense with his own money to complete this lock. We say that he shall take all the risk and all the chances of being reimbursed at some time in the future when Congress shall make appropriation to pay the contract price for the lock.

If there are any other situations in this country similar to this, if there is any other case parallel to it, amend the joint resolution; I shall not object to it. You may include every project in this country that is nearing completion where the contractor himself comes forward and says, "I will do it at my own risk, at my own expense, and if you never make any appropriation to pay me it is my loss."

That is all there is in the joint resolution, and it seems to me that there ought not to be any objection to its passage.

Mr. WHITE. Will my colleague allow me just one moment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to say, in addition to what my colleague has said, that any substantial delay of this work will cost the Government $250,000, as I am informed has been estimated by the Engineering Department. This is the season of the year above all other seasons when the work can best be done. This is the dry season, and if we allow this season to pass and the winter rains to come it necessitates waiting until about this time next year, or at least we take the chance of having that to contend with. The risk of high water during the winter, spring, and summer are not only to the disadvantage of the contractor but to the disadvantage of the Government as well, and the long delay of conveying our coal, iron, and steel to the Gulf will result.

As my colleague has said, this is the last step to be taken in bringing to final accomplishment a great Government enterprise. The money for that great enterprise has been already expended by the Government, and it only needs a small amount to vitalize this vast expenditure and give its benefit to the country.

I do hope and trust that Senators will not object to the present consideration and passage of this resolution.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama what there is to prevent this contractor from going right on with his work without the passage of any such resolution?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I thought that could be done. The contractor and myself went to the Secretary of War and presented this question to him, and the Secretary of War said under the statute he can not authorize without the consent of Congress the continuance of a work for which an appropriation has not been made. The Secretary of War directed this joint resolution to be drawn; it was drawn at the War Department, and they are exceedingly anxious for many reasons that this work should be completed.

Mr. President, we do not come here and ask for an appropriation to cover this exceptional case, but we simply come and beg the Senate to let us at our own expense and at our own risk go on and complete this great enterprise. I have a letter, received this morning, from the largest coal operator in Alabama, inquiring when he may expect this work to be completed. He says:

I am opening mines on the river on this great pool; I am building barges, I am building tows, I am getting ready to avail myself of this opportunity at the earliest time; but I can not afford to lock up a large amount of money with the uncertainty in front of me that it may be a long time before I can utilize it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if this appropriation ought to be made, as it will have to be made if we act honorably in the matter after the work has been completed and we accept that work, why not introduce a bill making an appropriation to cover the expenses, instead of seeking action on this joint resolution allowing the contractor to go ahead with the work and appropriate for it afterwards?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, there is a provision in the pending river and harbor bill that provides the appropriation necessary to complete this work; but the trouble is, as I have before stated, that the contractor employed on this work had 500 men whom he was compelled to lay off last Saturday because the appropriation had become exhausted.

Mr. McCUMBER. What I want to get at is, Is it not just as easy to put through a special appropriation bill for this particular purpose as it is to pass this special joint resolution authorizing the contractor to go on with his work for which it may be necessary afterwards to pass a special bill to pay him?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think that is quite the situation. I had very grave doubt in my mind whether we could pass a special bill for this purpose; I had very grave doubt in my mind whether Senators would be willing to take this situation out of the ordinary, although it is out of the ordinary, and make an exception in its behalf and appropriate money directly for it. Therefore the contractor said, "I will furnish the money until the appropriation is made; some time or other the river and harbor bill will be passed." This emergency joint resolution, however, is designed to prevent a suspension of the work for an indefinite time, a disorganization and disintegration of this contractor's force, and the delay which will necessarily follow.

The amount involved is small and the contractor is willing to go down into his pocket and put up the money. He says, "I will wait until you appropriate; and if you never appropriate for the amount of this contract it is my loss, and I will stand it." It does seem to me, under those circumstances, that there ought not to be any objection to the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, explaining the course I am pursuing, I desire to say that there is a degree of hardship here, but there is an equal amount of hardship in similar situations in at least a dozen other cases in the country. It has always been true of our river and harbor legislation that special partiality has been shown to localities which insisted more strenuously and in a louder tone upon favor being done to them. The only correct rule to follow is to treat all alike; and I must object to this being treated as a separate case.

Representations have been made to me as to the discharge of men in other places. I take it that it is the intention to pass a river and harbor bill at this session. Opponents of the measure, who have fought it, consider the bill as reported to the Senate as faulty to the last degree; we are opposed to the passage of the bill in its present form, but we have no objection to the passage of a measure which shall be purged of objectionable items. We favor the passage of such a bill. It has been announced here that it is a part of the program to bring up the river and harbor bill and pass some such measure before Congress adjourns. We understand that to be the case and shall endeavor to shape our course accordingly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio says he is in favor of passing the river and harbor bill if it is purged. Who does he wish to do the purging? Does he expect the Congress of the United States to do the purging, or is he himself and the gentlemen who are cooperating with him insisting that they shall be permitted to do the purging?

Mr. BURTON. The opponents of the bill expect to argue the features of the bill and point out its objectionable features. I may say frankly here that every one understands the pressure under which Members of the Senate and the House are under as to particular items. What is the natural attitude of those who oppose the bill when we are told repeatedly by Senators that they must vote for this bill, although they consider it most objectionable and think it ought not to pass in its present form?

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I am somewhat familiar with the river and harbor appropriations, and I wish to say that there is not a single case that is so acute and so important and where the conditions are such as they are in this case. I sincerely trust that whatever objection the Senator from Ohio may have to the provisions of the river and harbor bill, in view of the emergency in connection with this improvement, he will withdraw his objection. That can not militate against his objections to the other features of the bill in the least. This case stands on its own peculiar conditions. It would be unfortunate, to my mind, to dismantle the whole work in its present stage and to send four or five hundred men home and suspend the improvement for another year. We ought to look at the welfare of the people in that community, and also at the welfare of the Government of the United States. If this work is suspended, it will entail a great loss, not only to the public in that locality, but also to the Government of the United States.

The Senator from Ohio is impressed with the idea that there are bad appropriations in the river and harbor bill, and for the sake of making a saving to the Government of the United States he is opposed to the entire bill; but here is an instance where, as a matter of fact, a quarter of a million dollars may be lost to the United States if no action is taken. I think, if the Senator from Ohio were consistent with his own gospel, he would let this measure go through.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Minnesota has considered all the projects where they are about to discharge their force, where there is an equal degree of urgency and in connection with which an equal degree of insistence has been brought to bear.

I want to say that if these contracts which are in an exceptional position can be marshaled together at a reasonable time from now, say in five days, and this joint resolution is again brought up I may not object, but I do object to its consideration to-day.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, I give notice that I shall call up this joint resolution to-morrow, and ask the Senate to consider it.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Ohio will not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being objection, the joint resolution goes over. Are there further reports of committees?

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I was appealing to the Senator from Ohio.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio has been appealed to three times, and has refused to consent to the present consideration of the joint resolution, which goes over.

Mr. WHITE. But, Mr. President, sometimes a man who has been appealed to the third time and refused may be induced to yield when the fourth appeal is made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further reports of committees?

Mr. WHITE. I hope the Senator from Ohio will not——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further reports of committees?

MISSOURI STATE CONVENTION.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire to state that under the primary-election law of the State of Missouri candidates nominated for State offices, for Congress, and for the State legislature, together with the State committees of the respective political parties, are required to meet in convention for the purpose of formulating the party platform and to perform certain other duties. The convention is to be held on Tuesday of next week. Under the law, I am designated as a member of the convention, having been nominated for reelection to the Senate. I feel I ought to attend the convention, although I dislike to absent myself from the Senate at this time. I rise to make this explanation and to ask the consent of the Senate for leave of absence beginning to-morrow and for the greater part of the next week.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none; and the Senator from Missouri is excused from attendance upon the Senate.

COAL SUPPLY FOR ALASKA.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the Senator from Arkansas proceeds, I should like to ask unanimous consent to have read from the desk a telegram relating to another contingency precipitated by the war, which demands action.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

CORDOVA, ALASKA, August 12, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH, Washington, D. C.:

British Columbia coal Alaska's only supply. Liable be withheld any day. Can't you give us legislative assistance opening our coal?

CORDOVA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 6357, which is the war-risk insurance bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 6357) to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war-risk insurance in the Treasury Department.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, the bill which has just been called up for consideration by the Senate is known as the war-risk insurance bill. It is one of the emergency measures made necessary by the existence of the deplorable war in Europe. It has been discovered that because of its widespread effect and influence that this war has interfered with our commerce in more ways than wars ordinarily do with the commerce of a neutral, and that, therefore, there has been developed a necessity for some such measure as this. It has been formulated with the cooperative action of practical business men familiar with matters of this kind.

The bill provides that when adequate insurance can not be obtained from private companies upon reasonable rates the Government of the United States may assume that part of the marine risk known as the war risk; that is to say, it does not include the ordinary risks of navigation, but the risk which the Government is thereby authorized to assume is confined exclusively to those dangers known as war risks, such, for instance, as seizure and condemnation as a prize, possible assault by one or the other of the belligerents, contact with a mine, or some of the numerous dangers that are peculiarly inherent in war.

The amount appropriated is $5,000,000, and a bureau is created in the Treasury Department to take charge of the matter of administering the law along scientific lines, as they are understood in that particular branch of business.

The necessity for the bill at this time grows entirely out of existing conditions in Europe. The war has interfered with shipping to such an extent that the European nations interested in sea commerce have taken upon themselves this peculiar risk, because private companies seem undisposed to assume it in the usual form of issuing an insurance policy against it. That is distinctly true of England, France, and Germany. The rate of premium for insuring against the war risk, separately considered, has been as high as 10 per cent in this country during the prevalence of this war. The current rate here has now gone down almost to normal by reason of the announcement made by the British Admiralty that the sea path from this country to England is now open and under adequate protection from the fleets of that country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume that the necessity for this measure arises from the circumstance that in all human probability we will put foreign-built steamships into the commercial business of the United States.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is one of the contingencies for which we seek to provide.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is another question I want to propound to the Senator. I notice—and that is the usual method, but I think sometimes it is an unnecessary thing to do—that a bureau is provided for, to be presided over by a $6,000 man, who is to have under him various other officers whose salaries will not exceed $5,000, and numerous employees apparently at $3,000 or less. The conduct of this work, it seems to me, will not be a very great task, and I inquire of the Senator, Could not the Treasury Department with its present force attend to this business?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Well, Mr. President, those who will be in charge of the administrative end of this matter seem to think that it will be necessary to establish a bureau consisting of persons who are familiar with the technical features of this particular business; that the ordinary employees of the Treasury Department do not have that technical knowledge of the business of insurance that will enable them to dispose of it as expeditiously and correctly as that business ought under existing emergencies to be attended to.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator, because I have not read the bill carefully, whether, this being an emergency measure, it provides that the bureau shall go out of existence when the emergency ceases, and, if not, ought not the bill to so provide?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Section 9 provides:

That the President is authorized to suspend the operation of this act whenever he shall find that the necessity for further war-risk insurance by the Government has ceased to exist.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think that is a wise provision.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The bill is well guarded. It was submitted to the Committee on Commerce, and at the meeting of that committee there was a very large attendance of its members, and such defects as were deemed to exist have been cured by amendment. The bill meets the unanimous approval of that committee. The text bill was originally worked out by a joint committee of business men, shippers, and insurance men, together with such experts as the Treasury Department could call to its aid.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no doubt the bill has been very carefully examined and very carefully considered by the committee, and I am very strongly in favor of the proposed legislation, because unless the Government does in some way protect the shippers in these foreign-built vessels I am satisfied the rates of insurance would be prohibitive.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That has been indicated by the recent action of the insurance companies.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I want to do everything that is necessary and proper, of course, in the present emergency; but does not the Senator think that our situation is entirely different from that of England or France or any of the countries that are at war?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. In many respects it is.

Mr. JONES. We are a neutral power, and our ships, flying our flag, will be neutral ships, and they are not subject to attack by these warring nations like the English or German ships are. We are not a belligerent nation; they are.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is correct; but that is only one feature of the risk covered by the contracts of insurance authorized by this bill. Our ships might run on a mine. Our ships might have aboard something that one of the belligerents might deem contraband and be seized because of this. There are a great many vicissitudes of the sea not covered by ordinary marine insurance.

Mr. JONES. Suppose one of our ships does have on board something that is contraband. Is this Government going to protect and encourage the trade in contraband goods, and will not that be the result of this legislation?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That would depend altogether on the intent. If it were one of the well-known articles of absolute contraband, or if there were evidence otherwise that the ship was engaged in unlawful traffic, every contract growing out of that relationship would, of course, be deemed void.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me, from what the Senator says, that this is an invitation for these people to engage in contraband shipment, because it says——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No; the Senator misunderstood me. If I made any such impression on his mind, I did not intend to do so.

Mr. JONES. I thought not; and yet it seems to me this legislation would invite that very thing.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I assumed that the Senator from Washington was a better seaman than I am——

Mr. JONES. No.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. And that he would understand what war risks are. They are not all confined to a seizure by a belligerent.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me very strange that a few days ago, when we were urging that we should have some legislation to let in foreign-built ships under our flag, there were such a great many of them that were anxious to get under it, and now they seem to hold off until the Government gets behind them and protects them with an insurance system in carrying these cargoes.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. No matter whether that necessity is real or not, the situation exists, and it is the duty of this Government to provide for it.

Mr. JONES. I doubt it very much.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is deterring persons from buying foreign-built ships and entering them under American registry in accordance with the provisions of the act recently passed by the Congress.

Mr. JONES. Why should they be afraid to get under the American flag?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. They have not called upon me, and I doubt if they have called upon the Senator from Washington, to say why they should be thus afraid. They have expressed that fear in the practical way of refusing to avail themselves of the provisions of that act. It is our duty to take notice of that situation, and provide against it.

Mr. JONES. Will the Government get behind any proposition that may be put up to the Government at this time of emergency? It seems to me that instead of letting the brakes entirely loose we ought to keep the brakes on a little. We must not get hysterical and accede to all the selfish demands made upon us.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator must not understand that this insurance is to be free and indiscriminate. It is to be conducted on business principles, and for proper compensation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Can the Senator tell me whether or not any other neutral nations of the world are making provisions of this kind?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I can not say to the Senator that that is true. My information is confined to the countries with which we in normal times have business relations, and which are now in a state of war.

Mr. McCUMBER. I confess that the matter is a little foggy to me.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I understand that Holland has such an arrangement for war-risk insurance by the Government. It is the only one I can call to mind that is not now actively engaged in warfare.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to answer the interrogatory of the Senator from North Dakota, almost every other neutral nation has ships of its own in which it can convey its products. It does not have to purchase ships from belligerents or anyone else.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The answer made by the Senator from New Hampshire seems to be a very complete one.

Mr. McCUMBER. If these ships are purchased, will not they be ships of our own?

Mr. GALLINGER. They will be whitewashed ships of our own, and nothing more than that. Let me make this suggestion: Suppose a ship of foreign build starts across the seas with a cargo of grain, and Germany declares grain contraband. That ship will be in great danger of seizure on the high seas.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is just what I am leading up to. Is it the purpose of this Government to declare in the first instance what shall be contraband, as against the declaration of the powers that are at war themselves? If she assumed such a right, then she might assume that she had a right to send any of these vessels into any foreign port with breadstuffs or anything else but war material, although these things might be as beneficial to the country receiving them as the very war material itself.

I had always supposed that the international rule was that the belligerent nations were generally unmolested as to what they should deem expedient as to the shipping that should go into the ports of the countries with which they were at war, and without any preventive measures being taken by themselves. If I understand this bill, however, while it is not in direct terms such as would grant the power, it is based upon the assumption that we will load these ships with any material we see fit, and, with the Government back of them, we will send them into any port we can get them into, and as we have to back the insurance we will see to it—if necessary, with the arms and power of the Government—that no other nation shall interfere with them.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator takes an extreme view of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am looking for trouble in a bill of this kind.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. There is no trouble in it. It is a mere commercial regulation or provision to make commerce freer and to relieve it of some of the very difficulties that the Senator so plainly indicates.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to say to the Senator from North Dakota that manifestly such a policy would not include a risk covering the carrying of goods which were contraband of war. No marine policy, so far as I know, covers that point. There are a great many other war risks that are incident to a state of belligerency; but in any war-risk policy I do not think our Government, any more than any other Government, or any more than any private insurance company, would undertake to insure against the carrying of contraband goods.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That was the view I intended to present to the Senator—that every insurance contract stands upon its own facts and circumstances.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but the whole question will arise here, What is contraband of war? Are we to take one position and the countries which are battling to destroy each other another position, and are we to back our position with the power of the Government?

Let us take flour, for instance. We tried to get the nations of the world to agree that flour should not be contraband of war. Now, we try to ship flour to Hamburg, we will say. Hamburg is so invested now with British men-of-war that Great Britain might reasonably say: "This is supporting my enemy"; or, if we shipped it to Liverpool, and the Germans were sufficiently powerful on the ocean, the Germans might say: "This is giving succor and support to my enemies, and I declare under these conditions that foodstuffs are contraband of war." With our insurance back of that cargo, we are forcing this Government into a position where it has to declare: "We have insured that this is not contraband, and you can not declare it to be contraband."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator will read the bill, a great many of the difficulties that now afflict his mind will be removed. In the first place, where the belligerents declare certain articles to be contraband, I take it for granted that neutrals will respect that declaration when notified of it. I also assume that this proposed governmental insurance will be written with the same degree of scrutiny and business judgment that would characterize the writing of a policy by a private company, and that if a boat were fitted out for the specific and direct purpose of violating the laws of neutrality it would not be insured.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, Mr. President, this country, being a neutral country, has a right to ship its goods wherever it sees fit if they are not contraband of war, and the act is not in contravention of the rules of war declared by the belligerents. If it does that, where is the danger of our ships being seized and destroyed?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The fear of seizure, right or wrong, is only one of the risks insured against in this proposed policy. There are other risks incident to war which do not involve the violation of neutrality.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know the Senator has given one. The Senator has mentioned floating mines as one of the risks.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is one of the dangers.

Mr. McCUMBER. There may be possibly something in this; but I anticipate that any Government that sets afloat upon the ocean, without control, mines that are liable to destroy the shipping of any nation, will in the end insure that shipping itself and will be compelled to pay for the damage.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. This thing of compelling great Governments to do things they do not want to do is what has brought about some of the difficulties with which Europe is afflicted at this time.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. WEEKS. I will suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that floating mines are not necessarily capable of changing their location when they are planted. Mines are placed to defend certain waters, and they are anchored; but as a result of storms they frequently become detached from their anchors and then become floating mines and dangerous to general navigation. The setting adrift of mines indiscriminately, I think, has never been undertaken by any nation.

What I want to say to the Senator from Arkansas, however, is that I am confident everybody wants to do everything that is necessary to protect our interests in this emergency; and what this bill purposes to do seems to be following a course that has been adopted by belligerents on the other side, generally speaking. What I want to call to his attention is that at such a time as this we are apt to do things which are unnecessary. I assume that this bill is simply an anchor to windward, to be used in case of emergency, but not to be used in doing a general insurance business; and its value will depend on the quality of the men who are to put it into operation and their knowledge of insurance matters. Therefore, men with the very best technical knowledge on those subjects should be put in charge of this insurance bureau, with power to discriminate between the character of risks, as would be done by any other insurance company.

I am not confident that there is not ample shipping available to take all of our products to their market. A New York paper this morning states, for example, that there are 130 British ships in Atlantic ports waiting for cargoes; and somebody who wanted to send abroad a cargo of coal from Norfolk asked for bids, and 40 ships offered for that purpose. The Lloyds' risks are now lower on English ships carrying English cargoes than the risks offered by the English Government. They are down pretty nearly to normal, not over 2 to 3 per cent. I do not think we ought to go into the insurance business under those circumstances, but only when the risks become exorbitant, as they were 10 days ago.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. In making that observation, has not the Senator overlooked the plain provision of the bill, which says, starting on line 14, page 2:

> Whenever it shall appear to the Secretary that American vessels, shippers, or importers in American vessels are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance on terms of substantial equality with the vessels or shippers of other countries.

This act is only to come into operation when adequate insurance on reasonable terms can not be otherwise obtained.

Mr. WEEKS. We have been able from the beginning of hostilities, and are able to-day, to obtain insurance on better terms than any other country on our own ships and our own cargoes.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. If this happy condition continues, then there will be no Government insurance.

Mr. WEEKS. If that is the understanding, I see no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is the distinct understanding, because such are the plain provisions of the bill.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas for a little information.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. LANE. I understood the Senator to say that these ships are liable to run over submarine mines, which will explode and destroy the ship and the cargo.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I did not say they were very liable to do it. They may do so.

Mr. LANE. Yes; they may do it. That is one of the risks of war. If that should happen, it would be very apt to destroy the ship, and probably destroy the lives of the members of the crew and the officers. Why not put in here a provision insuring their lives also? Why would not that be an important addition to it, and a humane one?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The ordinary life and accident insurance companies now take that risk.

Mr. LANE. Not the war risk, I think. I think they will find just as much difficulty in having their lives insured as the merchants who are endeavoring to ship their goods foreign will have in insuring their goods. Their lives are just as valuable to them as are the cargoes of these ships to their owners. It would be a humane move on the part of this Government—a little bit paternalistic, to be sure—if it would go further, and on a broader ground, and insert in the bill a provision which would allow just and reasonable insurance to the lives of the men who have to risk them in carrying this merchandise to foreign ports in dodging submarine mines and other sources of danger.

I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas if he would be willing to put in an amendment to that effect, in addition to the other provisions of the bill?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It could not be put in this bill without delaying its passage, and probably jeopardizing it, for the reason that it would involve the introduction of a complete code of life and accident insurance laws. There is no demonstrated necessity for any such relief, because the ordinary insurance companies now take risks of that character.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to say that the laws of life insurance are the best established of the laws of any line of insurance. There are none so well settled, none at all that have been worked out with the precision that those have. I think the Senator is mistaken there. I think it would give this bill a better appearance and add to its value to the people and make them have a great deal more respect for it than they will have for a bill which merely looks out for mercantile affairs and profits.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator is entirely mistaken. In looking out for commerce we are looking out for the people. We are as much interested in having our surplus agricultural and manufactured products transported to countries where they can be sold as the people who are to buy them. We owe large balances in Europe which must be paid either in gold or in the products of this country, and it goes to the very foundation of this country's prosperity to have adequate shipping facilities at this time. The existing emergency has nothing whatever to do with the matter of life insurance.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator one more question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas further yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. Does the Senator think he can assure the Senate that this bill will not be put in operation—that is to say, that the risk will not be assumed—if the rates of insurance which American shippers, ships, and cargoes can obtain are reasonable and are lower than the rates imposed on other risks?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly not, because the President is authorized to suspend the operation of the act whenever an adequate supply of war-risk insurance can be obtained. Section 9 is an absolute and specific direction on that point.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to offer an amendment at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Amendments are not yet in order.

Mr. LANE. All right. I will offer it when they are in order, then.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator expresses unlimited confidence in the assumed fact that if the law authorizes the suspension of the operation of an established bureau when the necessity fails for the bureau's work it will be suspended. I think the Senator is pretty optimistic. I have never known a bureau to be created in any of the executive departments that even confined itself to the original idea for which the bureau was created. It not only hangs on but it increases and adds to and magnifies its operations. We have had that time after time. I am afraid the Senator is too optimistic. I think he will find that this will be a permanent bureau.

The Senator in his reply to the Senator from Massachusetts said it was thought that this bureau ought to be established in the Treasury Department because the employees of the Treasury Department, the Assistant Secretary and heads of bureaus there now, are probably not qualified to carry on the technical part of this business. I think the Senator forgot in that reply that another section of the bill furnished us the technical information and knowledge and experience.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Experts are to be called for the purpose of establishing effective working rules and regulations.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yes; and generally in carrying out the purposes of this act. There is a board of experts to-day to act with this bureau that is created in the Treasury Department.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is a matter of detail.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But it is a board that is created the same as the bureau is created, on the assumption, I suppose, that the expert service which the Senator mentions is really required. Is it expected in that particular bureau of the Treasury Department that the expert service there is to be rendered by people called on from outside without limitation as to salary, and that the Secretary of the Treasury can pay as much for expert service as insurance companies pay?

I am afraid the Senator is building up here a bureau in the Treasury Department that is not only going to be permanent, but, like every other bureau of the Government in connection with the various activities of the Government, is going to increase and magnify itself until it will result in a tremendous expenditure, as some of the other bureaus have done.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is simply an incident of administration, and one of the abuses inseparable from government.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think it is a matter to be considered. If the Senator will bear with me I might say that I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts. I can not see that the emergency necessary for this measure really exists. In the first place, I do not believe that the Government——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Probably the Senator is not aware of the fact that within two weeks the rate has been 10 per cent between this country and England.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator is aware of the fact that now it is 5 per cent; that the rate has been cut in two.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is true, but it is still high.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I have no doubt that the risk may be something more than normal in time of war, but while the risk may be something more than normal in time of war, I can not see how the Government can, as a business proposition, and that is what this is, write insurance and give accommodation any cheaper or any better than an ordinary insurance company. The Government is not seeking to assume risks. The Government is assuming——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The private insurance companies are conducted for the purpose of making profit. This bill provides for one of the burdens growing out of the situation. The United States Government is disposed to take care of this not for profit, but will do so even if it should involve a loss.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is the question. Is this bill intended as a losing proposition for the Government?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Rather than see our commerce driven off the seas; yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In other words, is it intended as an insurance or is it intended as a guaranty?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator is familiar with the terms of the bill, and he can characterize them to suit himself.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It is a fact that we have passed a law here providing for the admission of foreign ships to registry. This bill is urged as an inducement for that registration.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. As a supplement to that bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. As a supplement to that bill, because of the fact that those ships can come into American registry, as I understand the Senator.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is a correct statement of the case.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No emergency, it seems to me, has arisen—it has not crystallized yet; but do I understand the Senator to say the Government will purchase ships to go into American registry?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That proposed measure is not related to this particular bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I know; but all through we realize the fact that we would have our flags on the seas carrying our commerce. It seems to me that while, perhaps, this bill may be necessary I can not see that it is so necessary as the Senator from Arkansas indicates, nor do I see any necessity under an emergency of this sort to provide for a great bureau.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I agree with the Senator in any view he may hold about there being too many public offices, but we can not reform all such abuses in this little bill.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; but we can minimize them.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The chances are that this bureau will not be in existence for three months.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There never has been a bureau created by Congress that has ever gone out of existence. We had a railroad commission, when for 20 years the commissioner sat in his office here and drew a high salary and never did a lick of work in or out of his office.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. He was a Government director in a subsidized railroad. The Senator was here at that time. Why did he not change that law?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Good heavens, you can not change a matter of that sort.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Then why impose on me the duty of doing it now?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But we have these evils present with us. What is the necessity of adding other things unless very plainly a necessity does occur, and why not guard it in some shape? There is no limit placed on the size of this bureau. There is no limit placed on the salaries which shall be paid.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Except the common sense and patriotism of those who administer it.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. But we know very well how short a distance common sense and patriotism go in an administration.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Whenever we get to that point we will not need any ships.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator has not had experience the same as I have with some of the bureaus of the Government.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have had a very limited personal experience with bureaus or their chiefs.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator is very fortunate in that respect. If he had had experience as some Senators have he would dread this formation of new bureaus in the Government, because he would know that they grow on their own work, and where they can not find things they ought to do they will find things that they want to do.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. This bill has been safeguarded to a greater degree than any one ever before passed creating a bureau, because it makes it obligatory upon the conscience and honor of the President to terminate the whole business whenever the necessity has passed away; and that he will do so, I have not the slightest doubt.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am scared of it.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I simply wish to add to what the Senator from Arkansas has said that I have information that rates have been charged as high as 20 per cent.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I heard a statement of that kind made as coming from the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], that a ship sailed from Baltimore loaded with wheat and that the rate of insurance exacted was 20 per cent. Whether the Senator from Maryland actually made that statement or not I do not know, but I heard from an apparently reliable source that he did.

Mr. GRONNA. I believe that we should pass this bill, for unless some legislation is had so that the Government will take some risks these rates are prohibitive, and the bill which was recently passed authorizing the Government to allow foreign ships to take American registry will practically be of no value to the producer.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Whatever they may be the rates are not prohibitive, because the people who have to have the wheat are going to pay for it, and tney are going to pay for it with insurance added. This insurance, whatever it may be, will not come against the shipper of the wheat; it will come against the people who buy the wheat.

Mr. GRONNA. It will come against the producer of the wheat.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; it will not come against the producer.

Mr. GRONNA. When a man buys a product, whatever it may be, every cost will be deducted from the price.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator has had that idea for many years.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I will conclude what I have to say.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will conclude in a very few words.

Mr. WALSH. Before the Senator concludes I should like to inquire of him whether his understanding is that the proposed insurance is to cover the ordinary risks of the sea?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is not.

Mr. WALSH. That is to say, the ship will be obliged to carry two policies?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Yes; it will require two policies—the ordinary marine insurance, which covers the ordinary marine risks, and this war insurance, which covers the risks peculiar to the state of war, and distinct in character from the usual marine risks incident to sea transportation in times of peace.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the idea of the Senator that it will be possible to make this effort on the part of the Government under those circumstances self-supporting?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The belief is that except as to foreign-built ships which will come under American registry by the terms of the act recently passed the insurance afforded by private companies will be adequate. There is supposed to attach to such ships the disabilities of their former ownership that amounts to an appreciable element of danger, which is sufficient to somewhat deter proposed purchasers who would otherwise avail themselves of the liberal provisions of the act just recently passed by Congress.

Mr. WALSH. That was not my question.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Which particular element of war risk will not be promptly and generally assumed by existing insurance companies. It is a new character of risk in this country, and private insurance companies at the present time seem slow in assuming it.

Mr. WALSH. The question I asked the Senator was whether he believed that the ordinary marine insurance being excluded, and the insurance being only with reference to war risks, the business the Government now undertakes to go into will be self-supporting; that is to say, that the returns will be equal to the losses?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is a matter of conjecture. The belief is that it will be self-sustaining. Generally speaking, those who are scientifically informed about insurance know that it is an exceedingly profitable business in all its branches.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator from Arkansas will further permit me, I wish to suggest that if this law does nothing more for the citizens of the Government, it will be the means of regulating the rate of insurance. If it does nothing more than that, I believe it will serve a good purpose.

Mr. JONES. Will the Senator from Arkansas allow me to ask him whether there would be any objection to adding to section 10 "to continue in force not to exceed two years"?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do not think that is necessary. I am sure it will not endure for that length of time. We can not foretell what actual conditions may be during two years. There would be no occasion for continuing it two years if the war should be terminated in two months.

Mr. JONES. The President has the power under section 9 to fix the particular time; but would the Senator have any objection to put in some absolute limitation, say at the end of two years?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator can not read the entire bill without reaching the conclusion that it is completely shown that this emergency bill is a temporary measure.

Mr. JONES. But I very much agree with the Senator from Wyoming that when you establish a bureau you can not get rid of it. The President may act, of course, honestly, but he has to act on the recommendation of the persons who are to be continued, and they never recommend either to do away with their salaries or to diminish their power or authority.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course the Senator will bear in mind that the employees of this bureau at $3,000 a year are under the Government permanently, whether the bureau goes on or not, because they are in the civil service.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I presume they will be included in the civil service, or they are there now.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. They would be chosen from the existing civil-service employees, I take it for granted, by promotion and transfer.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are on the waiting list now.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That feature of the matter I have not prepared myself to go into very largely. I do not know that I disagree with the Senator from Wyoming about it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can see a good feature in the bill. The really good feature I can see is that suggested by my colleague [Mr. GRONNA]. I can see no reason why there should have been an exorbitant demand for rates of insurance on neutral goods. I think the insurance companies were taking advantage of a condition to raise their rates where there was absolutely no cause for raising them whatever. So far as the Government saying to these companies, "If you will not insure for a reasonable rate, if you propose to take advantage of the American people and raise the rate and compel them to pay exorbitant prices in this emergency, I will step in and see that you do not do it," I am inclined to think that just as soon as the Government puts itself in a position where it will go into the insurance business our insurance will be exactly as it has been in the past, and the war risks will not increase it to any appreciable extent.

I made this suggestion with the idea of calling the Senator's attention to an amendment which I think might well be adopted, and to ask him if he would have any opposition to it. Of course, the Senator says you can cease to go on with your insurance whenever conditions make it such that the President may think he ought not to continue it. But suppose the conditions for ceasing arise before you begin your insurance. Suppose there is no demand for it whatever by the time you get this board organized, then would the Senator object to inserting on page 3 to line 6 the words:

Provided, That no insurance shall be made hereunder unless reasonable insurance can not be otherwise obtained.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is the very language of the bill at the present time. If the Senator will read section 2, he will discover that that is exactly the provision in the bill now.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator read me the section?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I will read the entire section:

SEC. 2. That the said bureau of war risk insurance, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, as soon as practicable, make provisions for the insurance by the United States of American vessels, their freight and passage moneys, and cargoes shipped or to be shipped therein, against loss or damage by the risks of war, whenever it shall appear to the Secretary that American vessels, shippers, or importers in American vessels are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think that is the same, because I should naturally expect that the British Government, being a belligerent, or the German Government, being a belligerent, would have to have its risks very heavy, while the American Government, being neutral, its citizens are practically running no risk at all unless they disobey the ordinary rules of warfare and the conditions that affect the belligerents in war.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Those are matters of detail that can be taken care of by regulations. To determine what is reasonable in any given case involves the consideration of all relevant and connected things and situations.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know it can; but I want to prevent the Government from going into insurance unless it is necessary. It does seem to me if the Senator believes it ought not to go into it unless it is necessary he might consent to the amendment.

Mr. WEST. Does not section 9 cover the Senator's objection?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That has been read four or five times. If the Senator from North Dakota is not familiar with it now, reading it another time will not enlighten him.

Mr. GALLINGER. When the Senator from Arkansas read the section to the Senate he properly read it. In line 14 should it not be "whenever"? It is printed "wherever." I think it ought to be "whenever."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is an obvious error. That correction should be made. In line 14 it should read "whenever it shall appear."

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator read it right. That is correct.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. It is an obvious error. That correction should be made.

This is not a matter that has been jumped up without due appreciation of its importance. It is the result of serious and exhaustive investigation and consideration by the representatives of those most directly interested in the many phases of the question, and no part of our people are more largely interested in it than those who want to sell our surplus to European consumers. The measure is proposed for the purpose of giving confidence in and vitality to the recent act which was passed authorizing the registry of foreign-built ships under our law, and to make out of it an effective system of navigation from which we can get practical and immediate results.

This insurance feature was not originally a part of the scheme to aid our export shipping in the present emergency, for the reason that the assumption was indulged that private enterprise would take care of the insurance risks, but a state of affairs has been developed which indicates that that will not be done in the case of newly acquired foreign bottoms, and that this measure is an absolute necessity. Therefore the administration feels that it would fall short of its duty if it did not present some such supplemental remedy as this, and I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I think we may well congratulate ourselves upon the careful manner in which the provisions of the bill meet a real existing emergency. I would not take up the time of the Senate five minutes this morning and delay its passage even that long but for a fact somewhat personal to myself.

I have expressed my opposition to what I understood from the newspapers to be the provisions of the proposed measure, and I expressed it upon the ground that the United States Government was taking all the risk and going to bear all the loss and secure none of the profits. This bill meets that objection fully, and therefore meets the objection which I had to the supposed measure. This bill gives the profit, if any, as well as the loss, if any, to the Government. I heartily indorse the bill. I think it is absolutely necessary. I have made these few remarks to explain an apparent though not a real change of front on my part.

It has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] and, I believe, by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], that the present marine insurance rates are low enough. That is very true; but some time ago they were from 10 to 20 per cent; and the very same parties that have recently lowered the rates can raise them whenever they get ready. Perhaps one reason why the rates went down was the anticipation of the passage of some such legislation as this.

I think the chief benefit from this bill is not going to grow out of any actual insurance by the United States Government of ships and cargoes against war risks, but will come from the fact that the moral effect of the passage of the legislation will be such as to prevent private companies from unjustifiably raising their rates again. So long as they are not forced to raise their rates by actual commercial necessity, with this bill upon the statute books they dare not do so, because if they do the United States Government will take the business which is a source of profit to them.

Mr. President, one part of the bill, section 9, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] a moment ago declined to read because it had been read often enough; but I will read it, because it seems to me that some Senators have not fully caught it. Section 9 reads:

That the President is authorized to suspend the operation of this act whenever he shall find that the necessity for further war-risk insurance by the Government has ceased to exist.

I have absolute confidence in the present President of the United States. I know that he does not desire that this sort of legislation shall become a permanent feature of the governmental policy of the United States, and that he will welcome the very first opportunity to dispense with it. I have a great deal of sympathy with what was said by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK]. It is very difficult to organize a commission which will ever cease to be a commission and the members of which will ever cease to draw salaries; but that grows out of the fact that hitherto commissions have been left to determine for themselves when they had finished their work, and, desiring to maintain their positions, to keep drawing their salaries, they have extended their work as long a time as they could. I once had a friend who served upon one of these commissions. I went to him and asked, "When do you think your commission will be through with its labors?" He said: "John, by skillful management I hope the commission will last as long as I do." [Laughter.] This bill, however, provides for the termination of the commission by the President, and in his discretion.

It has been suggested that we fix a definite period for its termination; two years was suggested. If we do, that would be taken as an excuse to continue this commission and its employees in operation for two years, even if the war ended in six months. It is like putting into a bill that a man shall receive "expenses not to exceed $10 a day," in which event the expenses never fall below that sum.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I propose to offer an amendment that in any case the bureau shall be discontinued when the belligerent nations have made a treaty of peace. Does the Senator from Mississippi see any objection to that amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I see this objection to that: There might be policies in operation and unadjusted at that time. I would see no objection to some period after the reestablishment of peace, but I see no necessity for either amendment. I am satisfied that the President of the United States will terminate this commission at the very first practicable moment. I am just as well satisfied of that as if I myself were President with my views upon matters of this sort. I substantially know from reading his past utterances those views to be his, and I know that a man as well equipped, as well experienced, and one who knows as much about the Government of the United States as does the President would be just as far removed as any Senator in this Chamber would be from desiring to continue as a permanent feature of the United States Government or for an unnecessarily long time legislation of this character.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think we could meet the objection of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] by substituting the word "terminate" for the word "suspend," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That the President is authorized to terminate the operation of this act whenever he shall find that the necessity for further war-risk insurance by the Government has ceased to exist.

Mr. OVERMAN. "Shall terminate."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Well, make it read—

That the President shall terminate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is better still.

Mr. POMERENE. What objection would there be to providing in the bill itself that no new policy of insurance shall be issued after a treaty of peace shall be signed?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The amendment I suggest will put an end to the whole business. I propose an amendment to section 9, so that it will read—

That the President shall terminate—

Not "may," but "shall"— shall terminate the operation of this act whenever he shall find that the necessity for further war-risk insurance by the Government has ceased to exist.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall of course not oppose the amendment to the bill suggested by the chairman of the committee [Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas], as it seems to meet the views of a number of Senators. I want to say, before the vote is taken, however, that personally I approve of this measure as being the first step in the proper direction. I believe in Government insurance, and I believe that this is going to be so successful as demonstrating not only the exercise of the governmental power but also as a matter of revenue, that no one will want to see it abolished, but rather will prefer to see it extended so that marine insurance, as such, will come under the domain of governmental jurisdiction. I hope that that will be followed by its extension in other lines of insurance, so that the enormous profits which this business now directs and diverts into private channels will become a source of national revenue.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator having this bill in charge may slur over certain of its provisions, and say that if the Senator from North Dakota does not understand it he can not make it any clearer, but——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator from Arkansas was not directing his remarks to the Senator from North Dakota. I said that section 9 had been read several times, and the Senator did not ask that it be again read. I assumed that he understood it.

Mr. McCUMBER. But there is one thing certain as to section 2.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. What is that?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is this: You have authorized the Government to assume war risks upon the basis of a belligerent; in other words, we can fix our rates, but the basis of the rates to be fixed are those fixed by belligerents actually engaged in war. A German vessel may at any time be seized by a British man-of-war, a British vessel may at any time be seized by a German man-of-war, but neither German nor British has any right to seize our vessels in peaceful and lawful commerce, though they can seize the vessels of each other. Therefore, if the Government of Great Britain or the Government of Germany considers 10 per cent or 20 per cent as a proper war risk, then, if this Government, under the provisions of section 2 of the bill, will equalize its rates with those of the belligerents, we shall have complied with this proposed law.

Now I am going to call the Senator's attention, in all good faith, to that provision, under which I insist this country will be placed in the position of a belligerent in ascertaining the basis for the insurance provided for in the pending bill, because the bill provides:

SEC. 2. That the said bureau of war-risk insurance, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, as soon as practicable, make provisions for the insurance by the United States of American vessels, their freight and passage moneys, and cargoes shipped or to be shipped therein, against loss or damage by the risks of war.

Now, listen to this:

Wherever it shall appear to the Secretary that American vessels, shippers, or importers in American vessels are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance on terms of substantial equality with the vessels or shippers of other countries—

Not neutral countries, but "other countries"— because of the protection given such vessels or shippers by their respective Governments through war-risk insurance.

In other words, if the insurance companies of this country say that they will not take insurance for less than 15 per cent, and it so happens that Great Britain, a party to the war, is willing to insure British vessels at 10 per cent, the Government will be authorized to equalize the British insurance by making the rate 10 per cent, when, as a matter of fact, it ought not to be 2 per cent, because there is substantially no risk which American vessels will undergo in the transportation of ordinary goods, as they will fly the flag of a neutral power.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. All we propose to do is to put our ships on a footing of equality with other ships with which they have to compete. If the war rate of one of the belligerents is excessively high, the chances are that would be notice that there was some considerable risk in that particular trade, or if the risk did not exist in fact, then the insurance companies would accept the business and the Government would not be called upon to write the insurance. The measure is temporary in one sense, but it is alternative; it is rather a precautionary measure, so that there may be some place in which legitimate risks of this kind can be written, if private insurance companies will not take them.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not what we want to secure, Mr. President. I insist that we want to secure reasonable insurance, not merely competitive insurance with British vessels. The Senator can not show that it is necessary to charge any more than ordinary rates at this time, or at least only a trifle more than ordinary rates, due possibly to the fact that in some quarters of the world there may be mines that have broken away from their moorings and are afloat. Is there any reason on earth why an American maritime insurance company should charge any more for insuring an American cargo from New York to Buenos Aires to-day than at any other time?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think not.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly not. There is no reason for its charging any more to insure a lawful cargo destined to a neutral port, other than the possibility of such minor risks as the Senator has mentioned; and yet if those companies should insist on maintaining an unreasonable rate, all the Government would have to do—and it would be justified in doing it under this bill—would be to make a rate that would equalize the German or the British rate upon cargoes which are subject to seizure at any time by the vessels of the other belligerent nation. That is not what I supposed I was to vote for in this bill; I supposed that we were to provide insurance at rates which would be reasonable.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The theory of the bill is to leave the business of insuring ships to private companies as long as they will take the risks.

Mr. McCUMBER. As long as they will take them at what rate?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. At whatever seems to be a reasonable rate, in view of all the circumstances.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not the way the bill reads; it says at whatever rates will equalize the rates which are fixed by the belligerents.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is the dominating rate; that is the influence that will fix the rate; and we propose to do as much for our ships as the other Governments have done for theirs, with such changes in rates and stipulations as the circumstances will justify.

Mr. McCUMBER. Why should we not do more? Why should we not force a reasonable insurance rate? Why should not the Government charge according to the risk? If there is actually no more risk to-day than there was two months ago, but private companies will not insure at the same old rate, then the Government should insure at those rates, and should not take as its basis the insurance rates that are fixed by Germany and Great Britain upon British and German vessels.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. I thought the Senator had finished his response to the interrogations of the Senator from North Dakota. If the Senator from Arkansas has concluded his response to the Senator from North Dakota——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I have not finished as to that matter. I desire to submit merely one further observation. The theory upon which this bill is drafted is that the Government does not want to go into the insurance business unless it is absolutely necessary to accomplish the wiser purpose of promoting our commerce.

If private enterprise will not take up these risks on terms that the shippers can afford to pay, then the Government stands there ready to take them on such terms as will create an equality between our ships and the ships with which they have to compete on the seas.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Arkansas, a question for information?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. My attention has been attracted to section 2, and I might say to the Senator from Arkansas that that provision being carried through the whole bill impresses me with the idea that the bill limits insurance to war risks.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Absolutely.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, I ask the learned Senator if a ship should seek to insure against fire, collision, or general marine disasters apart from the risks of war, it would still have to take out a policy from a private company?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is true.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, would not the private companies still be in a position of exacting the same severe prices for that other necessary policy? If so, it seems to me that we have gotten no further than to provide insurance for half of a ship, or half of a voyage, or half of a cargo, the other half or the other half interest remaining still uninsured, leaving the ship in those respects still uninsured.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is a business matter that competition will take care of. There is an adequate and more than sufficient insurance available at this time, and there is not any reason why they should not take that risk at fair rates now. If, however, a combination should be created, that would then constitute an evil that might be dealt with hereafter; but no such contingency as that exists at the present time.

Mr. LEWIS. So that, if I understand the chairman of the committee, it was within the mind of the committee that the object of this bill at present was to cover no other risks than those of war, leaving all the ordinary risks of the sea, apart from war risks, to be dealt with by private companies—private interests?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The Senator is right about that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that it be read for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will state the first amendment reported by the committee.

The first amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 11, after the word "insurance," to insert "by the United States," and in the same line, after the word "vessels," to insert "their freight and passage moneys," so as to read:

That the said bureau of war-risk insurance, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall, as soon as practicable, make provisions for the insurance by the United States of American vessels, their freight and passage moneys, and cargoes, etc.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, is this the proper time for me to offer my amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The rule has always been in the Senate to read the bill first for committee amendments, and then afterwards it will be open to other amendments.

Mr. LANE. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, did the Secretary take notice of the amendment in line 14, page 2, where the word "wherever" should be made "whenever"?

The VICE PRESIDENT. We have not reached it yet.

The SECRETARY. In section 2, page 2, line 14, after the word "war," it is proposed to strike out "wherever" and insert "whenever."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 15, after the word "vessels," to strike out "or," and in the same line, after the word "shippers," to insert "or importers," so as to read:

Whenever it shall appear to the Secretary that American vessels, shippers or importers in American vessels are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance on terms of substantial equality with the vessels or shippers of other countries because of the protection given such vessels or shippers by their respective Governments through war-risk insurance.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 2, line 25, after the word "vessels," to insert "their freight and passage moneys"; on page 3, line 3, before the word "cargoes," to strike out the word "their," and on the same page, line 2, after the word "each," to strike out "country" and insert "port," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the bureau of war-risk insurance, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to adopt and publish a form of war-risk policy and to fix reasonable rates of premium for the insurance of American vessels, their freight and passage moneys and cargoes, against war risks, which rates shall be subject to such change, to each port and for each class, as the Secretary shall find may be required by the circumstances. The proceeds of the aforesaid premiums when received shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 3, line 16, after the word "losses," to insert "and generally in carrying out the purposes of this act," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish an advisory board, to consist of three members skilled in the practices of war-risk insurance, for the purpose of assisting the bureau of war-risk insurance in fixing rates of premium and in adjustment of claims for losses, and generally in carrying out the purposes of this act; the compensation of the members of said board to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury. In the event of disagreement as to the claim for losses, or amount thereof, between the said bureau and the parties to such contract of insurance, an action on the claim may be brought against the United States in the district court of the United States, sitting in admiralty, in the district in which the claimant or his agent may reside.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, in line 19, page 4, I move to strike out the words "is authorized to suspend" and insert "shall terminate."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 9, page 4, line 19, after the word "President," it is proposed to strike out the words "is authorized to suspend" and insert the words "shall terminate."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have no disposition to interfere at all with this bill, and if the Senator thinks this is an unwise suggestion it will be immediately dropped. I will ask the Senator, in view of the fact that these bureaus and commissions do dawdle along for years after their work is practically accomplished, if it might not be well to say:

The President shall terminate the operation of this act whenever he shall find that the necessity for further war-risk insurance by the Government has ceased to exist, and shall abolish the bureau as soon as its work has been completed.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 9, page 4, line 22, after the word "exist," it is proposed to insert "and shall abolish the bureau as soon as its work has been completed," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 9. That the President shall terminate the operation of this act whenever he shall find that the necessity for further war-risk insurance by the Government has ceased to exist, and shall abolish the bureau as soon as its work has been completed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to offer at this time an amendment which will also insure the lives of the officers and crew against war risks. It is as easy to insure the life of a human being against war risks as it is to insure oil or wheat or cotton or mules or any other cargo. If the sailor or the officer loses his life, he leaves some one who is dependent upon him for livelihood. I know that is the case in every port I have ever been in. Why not insure his life against war risks? Why not? The average life term of a human being at every age is known. That question has been settled. It is one of the natural laws that is as easily ascertained as any other law known to science.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LANE. In just a moment. The working value of it is well known, and by paying to the Government a reasonable amount of insurance his life can be insured. It is as important to insure his life as it is to insure the cargo. Within the last few days I have noticed reports stating that merchantmen have been sunk in the North Sea and in the Baltic Sea and the vessels lost and the lives of the crew lost because the vessels ran upon these submerged mines.

I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, inasmuch as these ships will carry passengers as well as officers and crew and cargo, I was about to ask the Senator if, according to his theory, the passengers ought not likewise to be insured?

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I would say that that would not be a bad idea, and yet they are not compelled to go. You can not land one pound of the manufactured products of New England in a foreign country, nor can any other portion of this country land one pound of its products in European markets, without having a crew to take it there and work the ship. The passenger does not have to go unless he is hunting trouble, or going on business, or for pleasure; and I should think he could go and take out his own insurance; but you are forcing these men, or, rather, their necessity of gaining their livelihood compels them, to take this war risk about which we are so anxious when it comes to protecting of merchandise and produce. Why not give the member of the crew an opportunity to insure his life for the benefit of his dependent folk? After a while, if you do not do that, and these men lose their lives, the people of this country will have to take care of the dependents who are left without support. It is a perfectly wise and humane provision. It fits well into the scheme here. It entails but little additional trouble.

I am going to ask that that amendment be adopted, and that it apply to this bill, and I see no reason why it should not be adopted. This body represents the people of this country. We are not sent here to put forth our efforts merely in behalf of the business interests of the country or to protect them against loss. It is just as much our duty to look out for the health of the people of this country and their welfare and to protect their lives. In fact, it is more so, if you really reduce it to the last analysis.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, and that is whether or not in the ordinary life insurance policy the risk which is assumed therein does not cover the life of a person belonging to a government that is not a belligerent in a war?

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I will say for the Senator's information that the insurance companies immediately decline to take any chances upon a man who travels out in unknown seas where there are submerged mines lying around. They forbid him to go without a special permit, if you please. If you want to go into Alaska with a dog team to engage in mining there, unless you give notice and get their consent, you are not insured. They forbid everything that involves great risk. There are many of the ordinary vocations of life in which many men are engaged, such as working in sawmills, handling saws, where they are not accepted by insurance companies; and a man who is going out upon a mission that puts him into seas where he has to dodge submerged mines will get no insurance, except at an exorbitant rate, if at all. Here is your opportunity to do good.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will ask the Senator if he knows whether the insurance companies are refusing to insure people who travel upon the seas as citizens of the United States? I will say to the Senator that everywhere I have gone I have inquired particularly as to whether the life insurance policy which I hold was good, and invariably I have been given the answer that it was good.

Mr. LANE. I advise the Senator from Colorado to inform the company in which he is insured that he is going to take a trip to Europe at this time and see what they will tell him.

Mr. SHAFROTH. We ought to know whether they are doing it or not, it seems to me.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to suggest, with the Senator's permission, that that applies to passengers.

Mr. LANE. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. Not to men who are engaged in the business. Your life-insurance policy will cover you if you are traveling on a railroad.

Mr. LANE. Yes.

Mr. WHITE. But they generally except railroad employees.

Mr. LANE. They do. Railroad employees are excepted. It is extrahazardous work. Now, why not adopt this amendment?

I send the amendment to the desk, and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 20, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That the said bureau shall make provision to insure against war risks the lives of all officers and members of the crew of all vessels provided for in this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LANE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH], who is unavoidably detained from the Chamber, and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. THORNTON (when Mr. O'GORMAN's name was called). I am requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and that he is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when Mr. PAGE's name was called). I wish to announce the necessary absence from the city of my colleague [Mr. PAGE] on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

So Mr. LANE'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I am not very socialistically inclined, nor do I believe in paternalism to any great extent. I intend to vote for this measure simply as an emergency measure. I had hoped that as an emergency measure it would be designed to meet the emergency, and I had hoped that Senators were not so tied to some particular proposition because it comes in that way from a committee, or in the original draft, that they would blind their eyes to all reason concerning the bill.

I want, in all good faith, to invite the attention of the Senators upon the other side to a little amendment that I am going to offer. Of course you can vote it down, if you feel that you want to vote it down, without using your judgment or reason upon it; but I want to put this proposition right up to the Senate, and that is that if Great Britain and Germany insure their cargoes against war risks at 40 per cent, and the insurance companies here will not insure for less than that, the Government is justified in giving an insurance of 35 per cent to compete with the insurance that is given by these nations that are engaged in war. I have understood that the purpose of this bill was to secure reasonable insurance and insurance that has some relation to the risk. If the risk is slight, there will, at most, be but a slight rise in the insurance.

I am going to move to strike out, in line 16, page 2, after the word "secure," all the words down to and including line 20. In other words, I move to strike out "adequate war-risk insurance on terms of substantial equality with the vessels or shippers of other countries because of the protection given such vessels or shippers by their respective Governments through war-risk insurance," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "just and fair terms of insurance against war risks," so that it will read that the Government will insure "whenever it shall appear to the Secretary that American vessels, shippers, or importers in American vessels are unable in any trade to secure just and fair terms of insurance against war risks."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask that we may proceed with the bill which has been under discussion until it is disposed of.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I feel disposed to say to the Senator from North Dakota, if he will propose to amend the bill by striking out all of section 2 after the word "insurance," in line 16, that I am inclined to accept his amendment. That is substantially what I understand to be the purpose of the act anyway. I never was entirely satisfied with that cumbersome qualification, which left too much discretion to the board to determine what was meant by "substantial equality." I have no idea that the board would conclude that the same rate was in every instance substantial equality with that charged for risks on the ships of other countries. I think they would weigh out in detail the different elements of the particular risk which was to be covered by the policy written by our Government and eliminate such things as were peculiar to foreign countries and did not appear to be a risk under our situation.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Arkansas will meet my objections, because then it will read:

> Shippers or importers in American vessels are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I accept that amendment.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I think that adequate. They would charge only reasonable rates. I therefore consent to withdraw my other amendment, and move to amend by striking out all of section 2 after the word "insurance," in line 16.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I accept that amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. BURTON. Let me understand that. Is it proposed to strike out of section 2, after the words "adequate war-risk insurance"?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; in line 16, commencing with the word "on."

Mr. BURTON. I think that retains the substance of the section. I do not think the objection stated by the Senator from North Dakota lies to this bill. It is not with a view to preventing the extortion of private insurance companies that the bill is to be passed, but because private capital is inadequate to cover the field. A new and extraordinary risk is imposed upon shipping, and a couple of foreign countries are giving war-risk insurance. It is desirable to place our ships on the same basis with theirs.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think what is left in the section will retain, in substance, what we intend to do. The word "adequate," of course, is a rather comprehensive and elastic word and we leave something to the judgment of the board in determining the risk and other conditions that should enter into the contract. I accept the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if that amendment is accepted this law will read "to secure adequate war-risk insurance." I submit that will cover the question of amount, but it does not cover the question of the rate. If you can get under this bill, then, as amended, an "adequate insurance," regardless of the rate which is charged for it, the provisions of the bill will have been complied with. It seems to me it ought to read "adequate war-risk insurance at reasonable and just rates."

Mr. McCUMBER. I should prefer that myself, but I was willing to trust the board to do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Undoubtedly the word "adequate" refers only to the amount. It does not refer to the rate at all. It does not refer to the reasonableness or justness of the rate.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I see no necessity for the adoption of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not offered it. I merely made the suggestion.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I see no necessity for its adoption, because of the feature of that amendment already contained in the bill beginning with line 24, on page 2—and to fix reasonable rates of premium for the insurance of American vessels, their freight and passage moneys and cargoes against war risks, which rates shall be subject to such change, to each port and for each class, as the Secretary shall find may be required by the circumstances.

That would simply be duplicating a provision already contained in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have great respect for the opinion of the chairman of the committee with reference to this act, but with such study as I have given I am not able to agree about it. The act provides, according to the amendment suggested by the Senator from North Dakota, that the bureau is to become operative only when adequate war-risk insurance can not be obtained. The word "adequate" obviously refers to the amount. Adequate insurance has no reference to the rates to be paid.

It is true, as was said by the Senator from Arkansas, that by section 3 it is directed that only reasonable rates shall be charged, but if adequate insurance can be obtained at whatever rates, however exorbitant, the bureau can never be established under the provisions of section 2.

Accordingly, Mr. President, I think to remove all possible question the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota should commence after the word "terms" and the word "reasonable" should be inserted between the words "on" and "terms," so that it will read whenever American vessels "are unable in any trade to secure adequate war-risk insurance on reasonable terms."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Montana is exactly what I have been insisting all the time the bill means. I have no objection to accepting it, so that it will read "to secure adequate war-risk insurance on reasonable terms."

Mr. McCUMBER. That is satisfactory, and I adopt that amendment. I was going to offer one that amounts to the same thing, but it will facilitate the matter by accepting the suggestion made by the Senator from Montana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is, on line 17, to insert before the word "terms" the word "reasonable" and to strike out the remainder of the paragraph down to and including the word "insurance" in line 20. It will be agreed to without objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire, if I may have it, the attention of the Senator from Arkansas. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will accept the following amendment:

That during the pendency of this measure the officers and crew of any vessel insured within this act shall be held entitled to all pensions as now permitted to officers and crews of the Navy of the United States. The sum of the said pensions shall be the same as to officers and crew of the vessels insured herein as is prescribed for officers and men engaged in the United States Navy assuming war risks and suffering death or injury therefrom.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I can not accept such an amendment as that. It is entirely foreign to the purpose of the bill. It deals with an entirely new subject matter, and might provoke all sorts of discussion, and require the development of an administrative system to make it operative that would delay us unduly. I can not accept the amendment.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to say that it appears to me that if the Senator could accept the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] for the personal insurance of officers and members of the crew, the guaranty of indemnity that is extended now to the officers and the crews of the vessels of our Navy should be extended here. In this way we have an inducement to the crew to take these war risks with the same feeling that they are placed on the exact level as soldiers and sailors. Such is the object of my amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not understand that these ships are going into war, or that they are for war purposes, or to run a blockade, or to take any risk whatever other than the mere fact that they may be seized by some belligerent power? Certainly there is no risk, as far as war is concerned, to the ships that will take out insurance under this bill.

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator from Utah by saying that I provide that the pension shall only arise whenever the war risk which is insured here produces death, or disaster, or accident, or damage to the crew or officers. They would not be permitted to enjoy this pension unless they were involved in some way in some matter which was a war risk. Such is my idea.

If the chairman of the committee feels that this amendment would embarrass the object of the bill, I am loath to have it offered. If he merely bases the objection on its merits without feeling that it embarrasses the policy of the bill because being foreign to the measure, then I would like to tender the amendment. I ask the Senator from Arkansas the ground of his objection? Does he regard the subject matter as foreign to the purpose of the bill?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do, indeed. I am sure it would necessitate considerable debate, and it might require that the provisions of the bill should be amplified in order to extend equal terms to those who assume equal risks in other departments of over-sea commerce. Then it conflicts with another purpose which is the foundation of the bill. The bill simply offers the means of obtaining insurance covering war risks where private companies will not assume it. In those cases where the private companies will assume the war risk there would then be no pension nor bounty, such as is provided for in the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, held out to the crews of those particular ships. The effects of it might be that it would embarrass the shipping business, creating discrimination between two classes of ships, those insured under the terms of the bill and those insured by private companies. It is not assumed that the Government under this provision of the bill will do all the insuring, even as against war risks.

Of course, I do not desire in the slightest degree to curtail the right of the Senator from Illinois to offer any amendment his best judgment may approve. If, however, the Senator thinks it is the right amendment to offer, and if the amendment should meet with the approval of the Senate, it is his duty, and I am sure it would be his pleasure, to submit it.

Mr. LEWIS. I realize both my privilege and right in the matter, and I acknowledge the courtesy of the Senator in so affirming it. I am, however, anxious that I shall not retard the passage or embarrass the course of the measure, and if those in charge of it think the amendment is foreign to the purpose, I will withhold it and present it at another time, should the developments make it necessary. For that reason I will not now tender the amendment, because the chairman can not accept it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I recognize that the administration is peculiarly responsible for measures to meet the emergencies that confront us, and I want to do everything I can to cooperate in every way possible to help the passage of proper measures. I think it is our patriotic duty to do that, and I know that there is no partisanship in connection with this measure or those of a similar character and for such a purpose.

I want to do everything possible and proper to put the American flag on the seas and to have our ships transport our products to the markets that need them. I want to assist in every proper way to get our products to market. But, Mr. President, in doing that I think we ought not to do it at the risk of involving us in the terrific struggle that now embraces every great civilized nation on the face of the earth except ours. I approve most heartily the admonition of the President to the people of the country to maintain an absolutely neutral attitude with reference to this struggle and those engaged in it, and I hope all of our people will heed it most strictly.

The only fear I have in reference to these measures that we are passing is that they will have a tendency to involve us in these difficulties; that they are likely to create situations which may give to some of the belligerents an excuse to embroil us in this terrific struggle, and if that should happen, of course all realize that we will have passed these measures at a terrific price.

There are interests that care but little what happens so they accomplish their purposes and enrich themselves. In time of stress patriotism becomes the cloak of spoliation. I fear the "interests," so called, are most active in taking advantage of the serious and critical situation that now confronts us and the world. These "interests" care but little what embarrassing situations may be brought about if profit accrues to them and their capital.

I hope that nothing of that kind will happen, but I simply wanted to say that I can not help but fear that these measures are likely to involve us in complications and in situations that may bring us into the struggle. I hope not. I hope this measure will not do what I fear it may do, and with this statement I shall not vote against its passage.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information. Does the Senator think that under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury the Government will insure a ship carrying a cargo contraband or an absolute contraband or a cargo of conditional contraband which a belligerent has declared that it would seize?

Mr. JONES. I do not think they would do it intentionally at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The very insurance policy itself would provide that ships must not carry contraband; and if the ship did carry it, it would be violating the contract of insurance, and then the United States would not have to pay a cent.

Mr. JONES. I am not going into details. I know this and the Senator from Mississippi knows it that war overrides almost everything. Contracts public are not regarded. We have seen already that treaties are not regarded at all when the exigency of war requires some course contrary to them. We know very well that if there is a desire upon the part of anybody to get somebody into trouble they may easily find excuses to do it. All I am afraid of is that some situation may come up by reason of these measures that may give an excuse, however unjustifiable it may be, that may lead us into trouble.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether Gen. Sherman did not say something about war?

Mr. JONES. Yes; and he expressed it as concisely as anybody could express it; but even his expression would not adequately describe the terrors, destruction, and sufferings of the titanic struggle now on, and nothing is justified that might involve us in it.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, this legislation, in my judgment, can be justified only on the ground of its being necessary to meet an emergency. It can not be justified, in my mind, on any other ground. It is putting the Government in private business, and putting it in business in competition with legitimate business insurance. It is, furthermore, conferring special privileges, special advantages, that ought not ordinarily to be done. It is extending special privileges directly to the few at the expense of the many. The masses are told that they will be compensated by indirect advantages; they can not stand many more such; they have already nearly been ruined by them.

As I said, however, it may be justified as a war measure, and it may be supported on that ground, and that ground only. I am afraid, however, that it will have an effect not intended, and that it will increase the price of the ships that we are buying. We are by this legislation, I am afraid, adding new value to foreign ships that our citizens may have to pay when they go to buy them. That is a matter, however, of policy that no doubt the committee has considered before it brought in the bill.

I wanted to say this much, Mr. President, before I voted on the measure.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass? The bill is passed.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to inquire if there was a vote taken? I simply want an opportunity to vote against it; that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All in favor of the passage of the bill will say "aye." [Putting the question.] Contrary, "no." The ayes have it, and the bill is passed.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to the amendment of the committee. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 17, line 12, after the word "misapplies," insert the words "or intentionally or negligently permits or suffers to be misapplied."

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I will not discuss the amendment to the amendment, as it has been thoroughly discussed, but I ask for a yea-and-nay vote on it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the amendment to the amendment be read.

The amendment to the amendment was again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TILLMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from West Virgina [Mr. GOFF]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I will transfer that pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] and vote. I vote "nay."

I announce likewise the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. MYERS]. He is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN].

I will likewise announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GRONNA. Has the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). He has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In the absence of the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], with whom I am paired, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMPSON entered the Chamber and voted "yea."

Mr. WALSH (after having voted in the negative). I transferred my pair to the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON]. As he has entered the Chamber and voted, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GORE. I desire to announce my pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. I withhold my vote. I request that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], who is necessarily absent. I understand that under the terms of it I have a right to vote on this question. I vote "nay."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey entered the Chamber and voted "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (after having voted in the negative). The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] having appeared and voted, I transfer my pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and let my vote stand.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CUMMINS], and that if he were present he would vote "yea." I think he is paired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "nay."

So Mr. KENYON'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is that proposed by Mr. CULBERSON to the amendment of the committee, on page 17, line 14, after the word "corporation," to insert "arising or accruing from such commerce, in whole or in part."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I do not desire to be put in the position of antagonizing an amendment offered by the chairman of the committee, but if we could have quiet in the Senate I should like to state——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. Senators will please take their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, while the Senate is in a state of hiatus, I ask unanimous consent to report favorably from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate a resolution, a routine measure, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent for the consideration of the resolution reported by him, which will be read.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, has the regular order of business been laid aside?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not been.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The regular order has not been laid aside, but the resolution which I report is merely to pay an employee——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. My inquiry was as to whether the regular order of business had been laid aside?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi has asked unanimous consent for the consideration of a resolution.

Mr. CULBERSON. The regular order of business has not been laid aside.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not understand the Senator from Mississippi has asked unanimous consent that the regular order of business be laid aside.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I only ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I have reported.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That can not be done without displacing the unfinished business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I ask unanimous consent that the regular order of business be temporarily laid aside. The matter I desire to have considered is a mere matter of routine.

Mr. CULBERSON. Is it an urgent matter?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is an urgent matter. It provides for the payment of the messenger for the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unfinished business being temporarily laid aside?

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

MESSENGER TO SENATOR GORE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back favorably Senate resolution 441, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 441) submitted by Mr. OVERMAN on the 17th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That Senator THOMAS P. GORE be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ a messenger at a salary of $1,200 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I understand there is a feature of this bill as to which the two Senators from Missouri desire to be heard at this time, one of them because he has to be absent from the Senate, beginning probably to-morrow. So far as I am concerned, what I desire to say on the pending amendment may be said later in the day, and I am perfectly willing to yield the floor and let the Senator from Missouri take up that feature of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To what section of the bill does the Senator from West Virginia refer?

Mr. OVERMAN. I call up my motion, made a few days ago, to reconsider the votes by which sections 2 and 4, as reported by the committee, were stricken out, for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Missouri to address himself to those sections.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, an amendment of the Senate committee, striking out sections 2 and 4, was adopted, and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] made a formal motion to reconsider that action of the Senate. He now calls up that motion to give the Senator from Missouri an opportunity to discuss the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on reconsidering the action of the Senate as in Committee of the Whole in striking out sections 2 and 4 of the bill.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. CHILTON. Will the Senator pardon me one moment?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CHILTON. I offer an amendment to the pending section of the bill, and, in order that it may be printed in the RECORD, I send it to the Secretary's desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

The amendment referred to is as follows:

On page 17, section 9a, after line 21, insert the following:

"That nothing in this section shall be held to take away or impair the jurisdiction of the courts of the several States under the laws thereof; and a judgment of conviction or acquittal on the merits under the laws of any State shall be a bar to any prosecution hereunder for the same act or acts."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to discuss this matter in the absence of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gronna	Perkins	Stone
Bankhead	Hollis	Pomerene	Swanson
Brady	Hughes	Ransdell	Thomas
Brandegee	James	Reed	Thompson
Bryan	Jones	Shafroth	Thornton
Burton	Kenyon	Sheppard	Tillman
Camden	Kern	Shields	Walsh
Chamberlain	Lane	Shively	West
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Simmons	White
Culberson	Lewis	Smith, Ga.	Williams
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Smith, Md.
Fletcher	Norris	Smoot
Gore	Overman	Sterling

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who has a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, sections 2 and 4 were stricken from the Clayton bill upon the theory that the matters therein contained were covered by the trade commission bill.

Mr. President, it is very embarrassing to argue a question of this kind in the absence of the Senate. I do not expect to be able to entertain the Senate. The roll has just been called, and 49 Senators have answered to their names, but there are now by actual count in the Senate just 12 Senators. The Senators who are present are the Senator from Maryland [Mr. LEE], the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. Since I have been speaking the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] has just entered the Chamber, as has also the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS]. I notice there is in addition——

Mr. KENYON. I learned the Senator from Missouri was speaking, so I came in.

Mr. BRYAN. I did not know the Senator from Missouri was speaking, or I should not have been absent.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that I am present and am always on his applause committee.

Mr. REED. I am not looking for applause, Mr. President; I am asking that due consideration be given this important matter. I have seen it happen time and again—and I am not complaining of the manifest indifference of Senators on my own account. This bill is not more important to me than it is to all other Members of the Senate. Time and again in the last two weeks I have heard grave matters discussed in the absence of nine-tenths of the Senate. Then, when the vote is being taken, Senators come into the Chamber and casually inquire what is going on and proceed to vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). The Senator from Missouri will suspend a moment. The Chair is advised that the Senator from Missouri has, in effect, suggested the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. STONE. Before the roll is begun, Mr. President, I make the point of order that the roll having been called a few moments ago, disclosing the presence of a quorum, and nothing having intervened since then except debate, under the ruling of the Vice President a few days ago, and following previous rulings of other presiding officers, the point of no quorum is not in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair believes the point of order raised by the senior Senator from Missouri is well taken. The junior Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. REED. I had not intended to suggest the absence of a quorum, nor do I propose to complain; certainly I have no personal pride in this matter; I have no personal interest in it; and I have perhaps been guilty of the same acts of dereliction which I have just referred to; but the two sections of the bill now to be considered are, in my humble judgment, of a crucial character. If the Senate will listen long enough to permit the points to be briefly argued, I shall be content.

Sections 2 and 4 were stricken out at the suggestion of the chairman of the committee. On three different occasions the proposition to strike out these sections came before the committee. I am not certain, but I think at one time the vote was in the negative, and on the other two occasions the matter was laid over. Thereafter the chairman, as I understand, canvassed the members of the committee, and, of course, acting in accordance with what he understood to be the opinion of the majority of the committee, suggested as a committee amendment that these sections be eliminated from the bill. I do not make the slightest complaint, but I state the facts, simply that the Senate may understand that the question of striking these sections out was not one which had been solemnly considered in the committee and approved by a vote of the committee.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. I do; certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. As the Senator has brought up the matter of what transpired in the committee, I remind him that one of the first things done by the committee in the committee room was to strike out sections 2 and 4 and sections 8 and 9. Afterwards that action was reconsidered and those sections were left in.

Mr. REED. That is correct; they were left in, and debated after that for, I think I may say, weeks.

Mr. CULBERSON. Subsequently the report of the committee was made on the 22d of July. After it was made the trade commission bill was passed, and then, on a poll of the committee, in consequence of the passage of the trade commission bill, sections 2 and 4 of the pending bill were recommended to be stricken out by the committee, and the Senate concurred in that recommendation.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, there is not any difference between that statement and the one I am making; at least, I hope there is none, and I do not think there is.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understood the Senator to say that there had been no affirmative action by the committee itself in committee with reference to these three or four sections. On the contrary, there was. In one instance sections 2 and 4 and sections 8 and 9, as shown by the minutes of the committee, were stricken out by the committee in its committee room.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, that is true; but it does not change the effect of my statement. I am only trying to have the Senate understand that the committee did not meet, discuss, and finally, after discussion, take the action. It is true that in the early days of the consideration of this bill a suggestion was made to strike out not only these two sections, but the very sections we are now discussing, namely, sections 8 and 9, and they were stricken out, but afterwards, after full debate, they were all restored.

Now, I want to be understood; I am criticizing nobody; I am complaining of nothing. I merely want it to be known by the Senate that there was a poll taken of the committee, and that that is a different thing in its effect than if the matter had been discussed in the committee and then determined by a vote.

Mr. President, the first thing I want to remark is that the trade commission bill is not yet a law. It may become a law as it passed the Senate; it may become a law in a very altered shape; it may never become a law at all. The House of Representatives sent us a trade commission bill radically different in almost every real essential from the bill passed by the Senate. The House has refused to concur in the Senate amendment, and the matter has now gone to conference. No man can tell in what shape that bill will come out of the conference, neither can he tell what its ultimate fate may be; so that, as a preliminary observation, I suggest that to have stricken out of this bill any of its fundamental propositions upon the theory that the matter was taken care of in the trade commission bill was a mistake, because the trade commission bill is not yet a law; I simply mention the point and pass on.

There is a very great difference between the enactment of a substantive law which absolutely prohibits a certain practice and investing a board with authority to pass upon that practice and to condemn it or approve it as the board may see fit.

What have we done in the trade commission bill? An examination of that measure will disclose that, so far as substantive law is concerned, we have practically done nothing. The first two sections relate to the organization of the trade commission. Section 3 relates to the power of the commission to make investigations. It prohibits nothing and it legalizes nothing. The board is, by section 3, merely given power to investigate, and if it finds that any law of the United States has been violated it is empowered to report its findings, and so forth.

Section 6 relates to the filing of annual reports. Section 7 penalizes the destruction of records. Section 8 provides for compelling the attendance of witnesses. Section 9 provides for the issuance of orders and writs against a corporation failing to obey an order of the commission. Section 10 is immaterial to the matter now under discussion.

Coming back, then, to section 5—this is the point to which I challenge the attention of every lawyer, and also every layman in the Senate. Section 5 simply provides "that unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful"; it does not, as has been so often stated, define unfair competition. It does not prohibit any act or succession of acts as unfair competition. It simply condemns unfair competition.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BORAH. I sympathize somewhat with the view which the Senator has with regard to sections 2 and 4; but I want to ask this question: Suppose that sections 2 and 4 were reinserted in this bill and that the bill should then be passed, and that the trade commission bill should also become a law, would not the Senator regard sections 2 and 4 of the pending bill somewhat in conflict with section 5 of the trade commission bill?

Mr. REED. Not at all; I think the two will run absolutely together. It will be noticed that by the trade commission bill the commission is authorized to ascertain whether any law of the United States is being violated, and to report that violation to the Attorney General, and to take certain other action. The trade commission, as I understand, could investigate any violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act and any violation of any amendment to the Sherman Antitrust Act, and, of course, any violation of the amendments we are now about to enact, for we are simply adding more substantive law.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not understand how the provision which I am about to read of section 5 of the trade-commission bill as it passed the Senate can be reconciled with the last statement of the Senator from Missouri, that the trade commission shall have the right to investigate all matters affecting the violation of the Sherman antitrust law. It says:

Whenever it shall have reason—

That is, the commission—

Whenever it shall have reason to believe that any person, partnership, or corporation is violating the provisions of this section it shall issue and serve upon the defendant a complaint stating its charges in that behalf and at the same time a notice of hearing upon a day and at a place therein fixed—

And so forth.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President, that is not the only provision.

Mr. BORAH. Mr President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. Well, I do, but I can only answer one question at a time.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has lost some of his ingenuity if he can only answer one question at a time.

Mr. REED. It is provided in section 3 that the commission shall have power, among others—

To investigate from time to time, and as often as the commission may deem advisable, the organization, business, financial condition, conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerce and its relation to other corporations and to individuals, associations, and partnerships.

Now, that is pretty broad. It covers everything:

To require any corporation subject to the provisions of this act which the commission may designate to furnish to the commission from time to time information, statements—

And so forth.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me for a minute while he is looking up the matter, I will say that while I have not the bill before me I have a very distinct recollection that one of the duties of the trade commission is to investigate the alleged violation of any law regulating commerce among the States. I think that will be found in the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. I should be glad if the Senator would point it out, for I have no recollection of its being in the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I will get a copy of the bill and see if I can find it. I certainly have that idea.

Mr. REED. Here it is. I read from paragraph (g) on page 19:

If the commission believes from its inquiries and investigations, instituted upon its own initiative or at the suggestion of the President, the Attorney General, or either House of Congress that any corporation, individual, association, or partnership has violated any law of the United States regulating commerce, it shall report its findings and the evidence in relation thereto to the Attorney General with its recommendations—

And so forth.

I also call attention to section 4, which provides:

The powers and jurisdiction herein conferred upon the commission shall extend over all trade associations, corporate combinations, and corporations as hereinbefore defined engaged in or affecting commerce, except banks and common carriers.

I think there is no doubt about the scope of the commission's activities. I pass on to state the main point I intend to discuss, because, if I am right on that point, I think the chairman of the committee and all of us will be agreed that section 4 should be restored. If it is not restored, then we will adjourn without any legislation remedying the evils at which section 4 was aimed, because, as I shall show, the matter is not covered by the trade commission bill.

As I was remarking, the trade commission finds its authority to act with reference to the practices referred to in section 4 of this bill, if it finds it anywhere, in section 5 of the trade commission bill. Section 5 simply provides "that unfair competition in commerce is hereby declared unlawful." There is no declaration that any particular practice, that any particular act, that any particular thing, is illegal. The whole matter is passed up to the board, and the board is required, after investigation, to declare what it regards as illegal. I am not going to argue the old question that I went over during the trade commission debate; I assert, however, that every man who has argued in favor of sustaining the term "unfair competition," without a single exception, bottomed his argument in favor of that clause upon the claim that the term "unfair competition" had been defined by decrees of courts, had been defined in opinions of courts, and had been defined by statutes of States, so that out of those decrees, out of those statutes, and out of those opinions, there could be found a guide to be followed by the courts, and the meaning ascertained.

It follows, if you were to go to the decisions of courts, if you are to go to the decrees of courts, if you are to go to the statutes of States for a definition of unfair competition, that if the practice you desire to condemn has been expressly upheld by the courts as legal, and if the courts have said that until the law is amended the practice must stand because it is legal, then clearly the trade commission, under the term "unfair competition," can not condemn that which the law has declared to be legal. In my opinion no man in this Chamber will have the temerity to stand upon his feet and say that the trade commission can declare to be illegal that which the Supreme Court of the United States has held is legal. No man, I think, will say that if the Supreme Court of the United States has expressly approved a practice as lawful, this commission can then declare that practice, which has been declared to be lawful, to be unfair competition, and thus overrule the Supreme Court of the United States. If the commission do any such thing as that, then we have created something which we did not intend to create.

I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, suppose the Supreme Court of the United States in their decrees should hold a certain practice to be unfair competition, because they have the right to pass upon that question, and it is naturally involved in the Sherman law. Suppose they should decree this thing as being unfair. Suppose the trade commission should hold that it was fair competition, and put their seal of approval upon it, because they have a right to say that it is fair as well as to say that it is unfair, and they must necessarily say that it is fair when they are passing upon the question or whether or not it is unfair. It is one of the things which they will determine to start with.

Mr. REED. Exactly; and then, when they went to enforce that decree and went to the Supreme Court of the United States, the Supreme Court of the United States would say, "Why, dear friends, we said it was unfair; you said that it was fair. Your decree comes to us now for us to pass upon, and we are going to follow ourselves and not you." That would inevitably follow.

I do not want to be diverted for an instant, however—even although the suggestion made by the Senator from Idaho was very pertinent—from this thought: If the Supreme Court of the United States has expressly said that a practice is legal, and that even that great court is without power to stop the practice unless legislative action shall be first taken, I want to know if there is any Senator here who will say that under the circumstances the commission, under this general power to condemn unfair competition, could condemn that very practice which the Supreme Court has said is legal? Can the commission set aside the law, and can the commission overrule the Supreme Court of the United States? Manifestly not.

Starting with that premise, let us see in just what position we are left with section 4 stricken from the bill. The Clayton bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives sought to strike directly two certain evil practices which have been most commonly employed by great combinations for the purpose of crushing their smaller rivals. One of those practices was local price cutting, a device that by the statutes of various States has been often condemned, not as unfair competition, but as unfair discrimination. The evil has been so well recognized and has been so long practiced that in some dozen States statutes of the nature defined have been passed.

The other evil, which I maintain is one of the chief weapons of monopoly to-day, may be described by illustration. A concern acquires a certain patented device. Of course, having acquired that patented device, it is entitled to a monopoly in its sale. As we have seen fit to grant that particular privilege, we can not complain, and we do not complain, if the patent is sold to one concern, and that concern has a monopoly in the manufacture and sale of the patented article. But, now, the concern enjoying the privilege of the patent is not content with the monopoly the law has granted. Accordingly, we find that it proceeds to extend the field of its monopoly by a species of contract which requires everyone who uses the patented device also to buy all of the other machines which he may use in his business from it, so that the holder of the patent in that way not only acquires a monopoly in the trade of the patented article, but compels others to buy, and buy from it, a large number of articles not patented. By the scheme aforesaid, because it owns one important patent, it forces a great volume of trade to come to it. Thus it proceeds to employ its legal patent monopoly so as to create a monopoly or restraint of trade in articles not patented.

This scheme will at first strike us as being plainly a violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act. We are inclined to say: "This constitutes a restraint of trade, because A, being the manufacturer of the shuttle of a sewing machine and the owner of a patent upon that shuttle, is entitled only to a monopoly on the shuttle, and when he attaches as a condition of the sale or lease of the shuttle that the purchaser shall buy the entire sewing machine from him, and that he shall buy the thread that is used on the sewing machine from him, he is attempting to restrain the trade of others, and that he is, in fact, so restraining trade."

But it happens, Mr. President, that some years ago this question came before the courts. Some years ago the scheme was upheld in what is known as the Button Fastener case. Its title is "Heaton Peninsular Button Fastening Co. against Eureka Specialty Co.," decided in 1896, and reported in Seventy-seventh Federal Reporter, at page 288. The case was decided by Judges Lurton, Taft, and Hammond, sitting as a court of appeals for the sixth circuit.

The facts were that the complainant made and sold a patented machine that was designed to fasten buttons to shoes with metallic staples or fasteners. On each machine sold—and I wish Senators would notice this—there was a little label stating that the machine could be used only with fasteners obtained from the owner of the patent on the machine. The fasteners were unpatented. The defendants furnished staples to the user of the patented machine, and the plaintiff brought suit for contributory infringement of the patent.

The court held that because the little notice was attached to the patented article which was sold, the individual who sold the fastener to the man who had bought the fastening machine had violated the law. The defendant was enjoined from selling any more fasteners.

No sooner was that case decided than gentlemen engaged in restraining trade began to exploit the new discovery as a safe method by which the law in restraint of trade could be circumvented.

The case referred to was followed in Tubular Rivet & Stud Co. against O'Brien, decided in 1898, and reported in Ninety-third Federal Reporter, page 200. That was a patented riveting machine, and it was tied to unpatented rivets. That is to say, the man who bought the riveting machine was compelled to buy the unpatented rivets from the man who sold the patented machine. Thus he obtained a monopoly, or at least a partial monopoly, not only upon his machine, but was able to restrain trade in rivets.

In 1901 the case of Cortelyou against Lowe, reported in One hundred and eleventh Federal Reporter, was decided, as was also the case of Cortelyou against Carter's Ink Co., reported in One hundred and eighteenth Federal Reporter, at page 1022. The case of Brodrick Copygraph Co. against Roper, reported in One hundred and twenty-fourth Federal Reporter, at page 1019, was decided in 1903. In all of these cases the patented copying machine was tied to the unpatented accessories, such as ink, paper, and so forth.

The same point was decided afterwards in Crown Cork & Seal Co. v. Brooklyn Bottle Stopper Co. (172 Fed. Rep., 225). That case was decided in 1909. The patented machine in that case was designed to crimp metallic tops on bottles, whereupon the enterprising gentlemen owning or controlling that patent stipulated in all his contracts that persons who bought the machine must use the corks and crowns he furnished, although the corks and crowns were unpatented.

The case of Aeolian Co. v. Jueig Co. (155 Fed. Rep., 119), decided in 1907, held that by this scheme a patented pianola could be tied to the unpatented perforated rolls of music.

The question finally reached the Supreme Court of the United States, and to that case I earnestly invite the attention of the Senate. Especially do I invite the attention of the Senate to the reasoning of the court and to the express declaration of the court that this is a matter for legislative remedy. I read the first syllabus in the case of Henry v. A. B. Dick (224 U. S., 1):

Complainant sold his patented machine embodying the invention claimed and described in the patent and attached to the machine a license restriction that it only be used in connection with certain unpatented articles made by the vendor of the machine; with the knowledge of such license agreement and with the expectation that it would be used in connection with the said machine defendant sold to the vendee of the machine an unpatented article of the class described in the license restriction. Held that the act of defendant constituted contributory infringement of complainant's patent.

The facts, now, in the case were these:

This action was brought by the complainant, an Illinois corporation, for the infringement of two letters patent, owned by the complainant, covering a stencil-duplicating machine known as the rotary mimeograph. The defendants are doing business as copartners in the city of New York. The complainants sold to one Christina B. Skou, of New York, a rotary mimeograph embodying the invention described and claimed in said patent under license which was attached to said machine, as follows:

"LICENSE RESTRICTION.

"This machine is sold by the A. B. Dick Co. with the license restriction that it may be used only with the stencil paper, ink, and other supplies made by A. B. Dick Co., Chicago, United States of America.

"The defendant, Sidney Henry, sold to Miss Skou a can of ink suitable for use upon said mimeograph with knowledge of the said license agreement and with the expectation that it would be used in connection with said mimeograph. The ink sold to Miss Skou was not covered by the claims of said patent."

QUESTION CERTIFIED.

Upon the facts above set forth, the question concerning which this court desires the instruction of the Supreme Court is:

Did the acts of the defendants constitute contributory infringement of the complainant's patents?

One can hardly imagine a better illustration than is found in this case of the length to which these license agreements can be carried if the law remains unchanged. Here was an institution making a mimeograph machine, with which we are all reasonably familiar. It attached to the machine a notice that the owner or the user of that machine, whoever he might be, must buy his ink from the gentleman who made the machine. A stenographer using this machine, a young lady, bought a can of ink that was not made by this particular gentleman or institution, and thereupon the corporation proceeded to sue the man who sold the can of ink to the girl who used the ink on the mimeograph.

Manifestly, if that sort of a suit can be maintained, then as long as a man has an article any part of which is patented he can deprive the purchasing public of the advantages of its free use by compelling all purchasers of the patented article to obtain the goods used in connection with it from him. Thus he can destroy or greatly injure his trade rival.

Manifestly, if this is true, if this doctrine is maintained, a gentleman who makes a sewing machine upon any part of which, from the pedals to the needles, there is a patent can provide that the thread used by every woman who operates that machine must be purchased from his factory; and any factory making thread and selling it to any lady using one of these machines with knowledge that she is going to use it upon that machine can be mulcted in damages, and the gentleman who has the patent upon the needle or upon the shuttle can in this way, in whole or in part, control the trade in thread.

But just as manifestly, if this be the law, if this be the right under the law of a man holding a patent, then no trade commission can take away that legal right. Congress alone can take it away.

Now, Mr. President, what did the court say about this case, and what warning has the court given to Congress and to the country with reference to this practice? Seven justices sat in the case; Justice Harlan had just died; Justice Day was absent. Four of the justices, namely, Mr. Harlan, Mr. Lurton, Mr. McKenna, Mr. Holmes, and Mr. Van Devanter, sustained the doctrine that had previously been announced in the cases I have referred to, to wit, that a condition of that kind can be attached to any patented article. Three of the justices dissented, including Mr. Chief Justice White, the others being Justice Hughes and Justice Lamar. I desire to present to the Senate some excerpts from the opinion:

Without reading the opinion, which has been made a public document, I have this to say: The majority held that the use of the unpatented ink paper, and so forth, in conjunction with the patented mimeograph was in violation of the terms of the contract of sale and was therefore an infringement of the patent, and that the defendant who furnished the ink with knowledge of the restriction was a contributory infringer. The court in its opinion said:

For the purpose of testing the consequence of a ruling which will support the lawfulness of a sale of a patented machine for use only in connection with supplies necessary for its operation bought from the patentee, many fanciful suggestions of conditions which might be imposed by a patentee have been pressed upon us. Thus it is said that a patentee of a coffee pot might sell on condition that it be used only with coffee bought from him, or, if the article be a circular saw, that it might be sold on condition that it be used only in sawing logs procured from him. These and other illustrations are used to indicate that this method of marketing a patented article may be carried to such an extent as to inconvenience the public and involve innocent people in unwitting infringements. But these illustrations all fail of their purpose, because the public is always free to take or refuse the patented article on the terms imposed.

That is what the court declares to be the law. I hesitate to express my opinion of that sort of reasoning. I proceed:

If they be too onerous or not in keeping with the benefits, the patented article will not find a market. The public, by permitting the invention to go unused, loses nothing which it had before, and when the patent expires will be free to use the invention without compensation or restriction. This was pointed out in the paper-bag case, where the inventor would neither use himself nor allow others to use, and yet was held entitled to restrain infringement, because he had the exclusive right to keep all others from using during the life of the patent. This larger right embraces the lesser of permitting others to use upon such terms as the patentee chooses to prescribe. It must not be forgotten, that we are dealing with a constitutional and statutory monopoly. An attack upon the rights under a patent because it secures a monopoly to make, to sell, and to use is an attack upon the whole patent system. We are not at liberty to say that the Constitution has unwisely provided for granting a monopolistic right to inventors or that Congress has unwisely failed to impose limitations upon the inventor's exclusive right of use. And if it be that the ingenuity of patentees in devising ways in which to reap the benefit of their discoveries requires to be restrained, Congress alone has the power to determine what restraints shall be imposed.

The court plainly states that it is our duty to provide a remedy.

As the law now stands it contains none, and the duty which rests upon this and upon every other court is to expound the law as it is written.

So, also, it will be the duty of the trade commission to expound the law as it is written; not to make the law. So, also, it is the duty of every executive or judicial tribunal that exists or may be created to expound the law as it is. All must act in accordance with the law as it is written; and whenever we cease to govern in this country by the law as it is written we will then cease to be a constitutional Republic. I am not saying that I accord with the reasoning of the court in reaching its conclusion upon the main point, but upon the question to which I have just referred the doctrine announced can not be questioned. I quote further:

As the law now stands it contains none, and the duty which rests upon this and upon every other court is to expound the law as it is written. Arguments based upon suggestions of public policy not recognized in the patent laws are not relevant. The field to which we are invited by such arguments is legislative, not judicial. The decisions of this court as we have construed them do not so limit the privilege of the patentee, and we could not so restrict a patent grant without overruling the long line of judicial decisions from circuit courts and circuit courts of appeal heretofore cited, thus inflicting disastrous results upon individuals who have made large investments in reliance upon them.

The conclusion we reach is that there is no difference in principle between a sale subject to specific restrictions as to the time, place, or purpose of use and restrictions requiring a use only with other things necessary to the use of the patented article purchased from the patentee. If the violation of the one kind is an infringement, the other is also.

And so the court proceeds and holds that if this evil which has now arisen, as I shall attempt to show, to monstrous proportions in this country, is not remedied by legislative act the evil will go on unchecked. There is not a monopolist in this country who does not own and control some article that is patented. Some part of his machinery, some part of his devices at least, are patented, and if this law as now declared by the Supreme Court of the United States is to remain unchanged, then the practice I have referred to will go unchecked, because, as I said before, clearly the trade commission can not declare that to be unfair trade which the Supreme Court of the United States has declared to be lawful trade because based upon a patent issued by the Government.

I am presenting these arguments to the thoughtful consideration of my fellow Senators. I am appealing to their judgment. I am trying to show them that when they refuse to reconsider the vote by which section 4 was stricken from the bill they leave the country without any remedy for these evils which have been declared lawful by the courts. The trade commission is powerless to grant relief against wrongs that have been held to have the sanction of law. Unless we change the law the evils will go unchecked.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. KENYON. As I understand the Senator's position, if section 4 is stricken from the bill these owners of the patent monopolies, which is a great privilege that has been granted them, can go on under the decision of the Supreme Court in the Henry case just as they did before that time and as the law is established there, namely, they can go on creating these monopolies with the help of the patent. If the section is put back into the law—as I understand it has been defeated now—we will stop that.

Mr. REED. We will stop that particular method.

Mr. KENYON. That will help some in stopping monopolies.

Mr. REED. And I think I can show before I conclude it will help very materially with reference to certain lines of industry.

Mr. KENYON. I was not here at the time but I ask the Senator what was the vote on striking out the section?

Mr. REED. It was a viva voce vote, I think.

Mr. KENYON. I am heartily in accord with the Senator's position. I think the section should go back into the bill.

Mr. REED. Turning again to the opinion in the Dick case, three of the justices dissented. Mr. Justice White wrote a dissenting opinion which, if I read it aright, is a direct challenge to Congress to remedy this evil.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. My information some time ago was that a bill had been introduced in the House amending the patent laws of the country. Perhaps the Senator has some information as to the status of that bill, whether it was reported out from the committee or whether any active steps have been taken to perfect the legislation.

Mr. REED. I do not know the status of that bill, but I can say to the Senator from Colorado that the House did pass the Clayton bill and did put into the Clayton bill section 4, and that section 4 is aimed directly at the practice.

Mr. THOMAS. I quite agree with the Senator as to that; but I was curious to know what had become of the bill which was framed by the House Committee on Patents and introduced immediately after the decision of the Supreme Court to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. REED. I am sorry I can not answer.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that immediately following this decision of the Supreme Court the chairman of the Committee on Patents introduced a bill meeting this situation. I introduced the same bill in the Senate. The bill was reported favorably to the House in the Sixty-second Congress. It was not reported to the Senate in the Sixty-second Congress or in this Congress. I think that no action has been taken by that committee during the Sixty-third Congress upon the proposed legislation.

Mr. REED. Possibly the reason is to be found in the fact that having the trust bill before it, the House of Representatives concluded to put into the trust bill the necessary provision to arrest the evil. That provision is found in section 4, to which I shall refer in a moment. But I now desire to call attention to the reasoning and warning of Mr. Chief Justice White, in his dissenting opinion, which was concurred in by Justice Hughes and Justice Lamar:

My reluctance to dissent is overcome in this case: First, because the ruling now made has a much wider scope than the mere interest of the parties to this record, since, in my opinion, the effect of that ruling is to destroy, in a very large measure, the judicial authority of the States by unwarrantedly extending the Federal judicial power. Second, because the result just stated, by the inevitable development of the principle announced, may not be confined to sporadic or isolated cases, but will be as broad as society itself, affecting a multitude of people and capable of operation upon every conceivable subject of human contract, interest, or activity, however intensely local and exclusively within State authority they otherwise might be.

Mr. President, I repeat, it is rather discouraging to argue questions of this kind with five Senators upon the other side of the Chamber and not many more on this.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I think that is true, and it should not apply to an argument of this character. I would be glad to make the point of no quorum if the Senator does not object. This is one of the most important matters in the bill, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. White in the chair.) The absence of a quorum is suggested by the Senator from Iowa. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	James	Myers	Stone
Borah	Jones	Norris	Thomas
Brady	Kenyon	Overman	Thompson
Bryan	Kern	Owen	Thornton
Chamberlain	Lane	Perkins	Tillman
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Poindexter	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Lewis	Pomerene	Walsh
Culberson	McCumber	Reed	West
Fall	Martin, Va.	Shields	White
Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Smoot	Williams

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. CAMDEN, Mr. GORE, Mr. SHAFROTH, and Mr. SHEPPARD answered to their names when called.

Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. HOLLIS, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. SHIVELY, and Mr. NELSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators having responded to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, for the benefit of the three or four Senators who have remained in the Chamber since the roll was called and who were not here before the call, I will say that the point I am discussing is that the Supreme Court of the United States having held that what is known as a tying contract is valid, Congress must prohibit such contracts before the courts can declare them invalid. I am further arguing that when we struck out section 4 of this bill we struck out the only remedy provided, because the trade commission, under the general authority conferred upon them to declare what is unfair competition, certainly can not declare that to be unfair competition which the Supreme Court of the United States has expressly declared to be legal. Therefore, if we strike out section 4, we leave no remedy for the abuse now commonly practiced by manufacturing institutions of attaching to some one of their devices a notice or attaching to their contract of sale a provision that every person owning that machine must buy his supplies from the factory, making the machine. I was engaged when the roll was called in reading from the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice White, and I will take time to read one paragraph again. He states as one of the reasons for willingly dissenting:

> Second, because the result just stated, by the inevitable development of the principle announced—

That is, the principle that you can tie to a patented article a compulsion to purchase exclusively certain other articles from the man who sold the patented device—> may not be confined to sporadic or isolated cases, but will be as broad as society itself, affecting a multitude of people and capable of operation upon every conceivable subject of human contract, interest, or activity, however intensely local and exclusively within State authority they otherwise might be. Third, because the gravity of the consequences which would ordinarily arise from such a result is greatly aggravated by the ruling now made, since that ruling not only vastly extends the Federal judicial power, as above stated, but as to all the innumerable subjects to which the ruling may be made to apply, makes it the duty of the courts of the United States to test the rights and obligations of the parties, not by the general law of the land, in accord with the conformity act, but by the provisions of the patent law, even although the subjects considered may not be within the embrace of that law, thus disregarding the State law, overthrowing, it may be, a settled public policy of the State, and injuriously affecting a multitude of persons. Lastly, I am led to express the reasons which constrain me to dissent, because of the hope that if my forebodings as to the evil consequences to result from the application of the construction now given to the patent statute be well founded, the statement of my reasons may serve a twofold purpose: First, to suggest that the application in future cases of the construction now given be confined within the narrowest limits, and, second, to serve to make it clear that if evils arise their continuance will not be caused by the interpretation now given to the statute, but will result from the inaction of the legislative department in failing to amend the statute so as to avoid such evils.

There is a remarkable challenge by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. It is couched, as all his utterances are couched, in the most polite language, but it is as direct as though he had said to Congress: "This evil exists; you alone can remedy it. If it is not remedied, the fault and the responsibility are yours."

Even the majority of the court went almost to the same extent in challenging Congress to do its duty. I read:

> And if it be that the ingenuity of patentees in devising ways in which to reap the benefit of their discoveries requires to be restrained, Congress alone has the power to determine what restraints shall be imposed. As the law now stands it contains none, and the duty which rests upon this and upon every other court is to expound the law as it is written. Arguments based upon suggestions of public policy not recognized in the patent laws are not relevant. The field to which we are invited by such arguments is legislative, not judicial.

And so forth.

I refer again to the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice White, concurred in by Justice Hughes and Justice Lamar, and I solemnly call your attention at this hour, when we are pretending to strengthen the Sherman Antitrust Act, to this language:

> I do not think it necessary to stop to point out the innumerable subjects which will be susceptible of being removed from the operation of State judicial power and the fundamental and radical character of the change which must come as a result of the principle decided. But, nevertheless, let me given a few illustrations:
> Take a patentee selling a patented engine. He will now have the right by contract to bring under the patent laws all contracts for coal or electrical energy used to afford power to work the machine or even the lubricants employed in its operation. Take a patented carpenter's plane. The power now exists in the patentee by contract to validly confine a carpenter purchasing one of the planes to the use of lumber sawed from trees grown on the land of a particular person or sawed by a particular mill.

If I were to use that language, it would be challenged as extravagant; but it is here employed by this great judge, who has never been known as a special enemy of monopoly, never charged with being an extremist or a crank along those lines, or, indeed, any other lines. It was written after he had heard the arguments of counsel, had examined the decisions of the courts, and after he with his great intellect had surveyed the field as it was left by this decision. Under such circumstances he solemnly adjures us to take action, and just as solemnly points out the evils which lie befofe us.

I continue to read:

> Take a patented cooking utensil. The power is now recognized in the patentee to bind by contract one who buys the utensil to use in connection with it no other food supply but that sold or made by the patentee. Take the invention of a patented window frame. It is now the law that the seller of the frame may stipulate that no other material shall be used in a house in which the window frames are placed except such as may be bought from the patentee and seller of the frame. Take an illustration which goes home to everyone—a patented sewing machine.
> It is now established that by putting on the machine, in addition to the notice of patent required by law, a notice called a license restriction, the right is acquired, as against the whole world, to control the purchase by users of the machine of thread, needles, and oil lubricants or other materials convenient or necessary for operation of the machine. The illustrations might be multiplied indefinitely.

I have the temerity at this point to inject one illustration. Take the so-called Steel Trust, and let it acquire, as it has acquired, a patented process for making some particular kind of steel. If Mr. Chief Justice White is right, the Steel Trust can stipulate with every man who buys that steel thus patented that he shall buy every other beam and girder going into a bridge or a building or a battleship he is building from the Steel Trust. Give it one upon some variety of steel necessary to be employed, and through the possession of that one patent it can compel every man who has to use some of that patented steel to buy his entire supply from it. It can thus vastly enlarge under the cloak of its patent its monopoly, and there is no power to stop it, for it acts in accordance with the law.

There is no power to stop it, I said. There is a power; it rests here in Congress, and the necessary amendment to the law is graven in section 4, which we have stricken out and which I fear, from the degree of interest being manifested, is likely to stay out, will stay out. I say, if it does stay out and nothing is put in its place, when this Congress adjourns we will hear the mocking laughter of every trust magnate in the United States. One and all they will agree that they have at last hit upon a plan to defeat the purposes of the antitrust laws of the country.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. KENYON. I was absent from the city at the time this section was stricken from the bill, and I should like to ask the Senator if there was any discussion of this section and if so what were the reasons for striking out a section of this kind when we were trying to strengthen the antitrust act?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I was absent from the Senate for something like an hour, having been called to one of the departments on some business. I had no thought that these sections would be stricken out, and it was done in my absence. What I know I know only by hearsay, but my information is that there was no discussion and no record vote.

Mr. KENYON. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken about one thing, and that is that there is no interest in this matter. I think there is a great deal of interest in it, and a strong desire to place this section back in this bill. The Senator has referred to the Steel Trust; he is familiar, I doubt not, with the United Shoe Machinery Co.

Mr. REED. I am going to discuss that.

Mr. KENYON. Then, I will not say anything about it, but that great monopoly has been built up by pursuing the course referred to by the Senator.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. In reply to the Senator from Iowa and also to the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri, I think I ought to say that these two sections were reached in their regular order when the bill was being read for the consideration of committee amendments, and they were stricken out on my motion, representing the committee, upon the broad ground, which the RECORD shows, that the Senate having passed a bill creating a trade commission which it was supposed would regulate unfair competition, jurisdiction should be given that commission over the subjects contained in sections 2 and 4, as well as others.

The Senator from Missouri happened to be absent, it is true; but there was nothing like snap judgment taken. As I have said, the sections were reached in their regular order, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will show, and the amendments were presented and adopted practically by unanimous vote of the Senate at the time, although there was only a viva voce vote.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if there was discussion or debate on the sections.

Mr. CULBERSON. None whatever. The record shows the satement I then made, however, which was to the same effect as the statement I made just a moment ago.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to say a word at this stage of the discussion. The facts about the matter are as recited here by the Senator from Texas. The interrogation of the Senator from Iowa, however, would seem to suggest that there is something obscure about it and that it is difficult to understand how anyone could take the view that this provision ought to go ought in view of the argument now made by the Senator from Missouri and other considerations. Of course that would imply that the matter did not receive very serious consideration at the hands of the Judiciary Committee, and the Senator from Missouri now indicates that he is utterly unable, as I understand him, to suggest what considerations might possibly be advanced in support of the action taken.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; I did not say that.

Mr. WALSH. Now, the truth of the matter is that the matter was canvassed at very considerable length in the committee, but unfortunately the feature to which the Senator from Missouri now chiefly addresses his remarks—the Typewriter case—was not at all discussed or mentioned. The importance of that case was not especially considered. On the other hand, the significance of the shoe manufacturers' case was very carefully considered, and the Senator from Missouri, when he reaches that, will point out to you, I have no doubt in the world, the very essential difference between the two cases.

It was intended in a general way that the wrongs and the evils arising out of the shoe machinery case should be dealt with by the trade commission. The Senator has now pointed out that some of the troubles arising out of the conditions referred to in the Typewriter case can not possibly be met in that way, and that may call for consideration. Let me say, however, in this connection, that its retention was urged, and it will be borne in mind that the committee reported it to this body, signifying that they were in harmony with the spirit of the provision, but felt when it came before this body that the whole matter could be completely dealt with by the trade commission.

But, Mr. President, it was urged with great force before the committee that the provision as it stands in the bill will possibly contribute to the establishment of monopoly as well as to the destruction of monopoly. The Senator has, in his usual forceful way, set out how frequently it is resorted to by those who desire to build up monopoly; but, on the other hand, we were told—and there is much force in the suggestion which I submit to the consideration of the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Missouri—that oftentimes a little struggling institution, competing in a feeble way against the great big monopolizing institution, will find itself utterly unable to meet that competition unless it can make a contract with some man to handle its line of goods and to handle no other line of goods. For instance, here is a man who has invented a harvesting machine, which he believes is superior to anything that is on the market.

He is struggling against the Harvester Trust. He gets Jones to handle his machine. Jones says. "Yes; I am handling the Osborne and I am handling the Plano and I am handling the Deering for the Harvester Trust, and I will be very glad to handle yours also." A man comes in to buy a harvester machine of him, and, of course, he wants the old standard line. He says, "I want a Deering," or "I want a Plano." The dealer says: "I have a new machine here that I think is a very excellent machine." "Oh, no; I don't want to look at that at all." He wants the other machine. It is just the same to the dealer. He makes as much money on one as he does on the other. If, however, the weak man can make a contract with a dealer to handle his machine, and no other, the dealer will labor as hard as he possibly can to catch the customer and get him to take that machine. So, Mr. President, this is not a one-sided proposition at all; neither was it passed upon by the Judiciary Committee without consideration.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am utterly at a loss to know what I have said that could in the slightest degree ruffle the sensibilities of any man. I have not charged the Judiciary Committee, of which I am a Member, with bad faith. I have not charged any member of it with bad faith. I entertain for every member of the Judiciary Committee the profoundest respect and for the chairman of the committee and for my friend the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who has just spoken, an affection. I know, speaking with reference to the two gentlemen I have just named, that there can not be found in the United States two men more earnestly desirous of relieving the public from every exaction of monopoly and of wiping out all restraint of trade. What I said was that I was absent from the Senate temporarily, and therefore could not answer the interrogatory of the Senator from Iowa, except by hearsay.

I did not claim that there was any irregularity in bringing up these matters. I was simply giving the information as best I could in answer to the interrogatory. There was no irregularity. More than that, there is no doubt in my mind but that those members of the committee who on the poll were willing to strike out section 4 did so in the best of faith, believing that the subject matter could be controlled by the trade commission. The purpose I have this afternoon is to demonstrate that that reason, which affected their judgment and caused their action, is erroneous because of the decision of the Supreme Court. So I am addressing myself to them as much as to others. The remark which seems to have stirred the Senate was the one in which, in substance, I said that the responsibility is now upon us to act, and if we do not act that the proprietor of every trust in the country will break into ironical laughter when Congress adjourns. That is a bit of imagination, but I will trust my imagination to be reasonably accurate this time.

Now, another observation——

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, before the Senator passes to another subject I should like to address a general question to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Supreme Court in the Dick case, from which the Senator has been reading, held in effect that so far as the contract which was under consideration was concerned the patent law of the United States was superior to the Sherman antitrust law. What I want to know from the Senator is whether it would not be more appropriate, and, in fact, absolutely necessary, in view of that decision, to amend the patent law rather than to cover the question by a supplement to the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; I can not agree with the Senator in regard to that. It is, of course, true, and no one will dispute it, that in the enactment of this antitrust bill we can by substantive provisions change any other law of the United States with reference to any subject. We do here, in section 4, expressly limit the patent law, because we insert the language—and it was put in in our committee at the time we intended to report this section favorably—"whether patented or unpatented," so that with that phrase here we at once cut off at the roots any claim based upon the patent laws.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri further yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CULBERSON. In that connection, I will ask the Senator if he thinks we can pass a law now which will limit the rights of patentees of patents already in existence, and before their expiration?

Mr. REED. I have not the slightest doubt but that the Congress of the United States can pass a law at this time providing that no man who has a patent shall attach to the sale of the patented article any condition whatsoever. I have no doubt on earth but that Congress can to-day repeal every patent law there is upon the books and end every patent at this moment; but I do not need to cross that bridge or take that position, and I have made that statement without examining the patent laws. Beyond all question, however, the right to make tying contracts is not embraced in a patent in such manner as to place it beyond the power of Congress. Congress did not give to these patentees the right to make certain kinds of contracts. It gave them a monopoly upon the use of their tool or instrument; but, as is suggested by the Chief Justice, and also by the entire court, Congress can remedy this evil by a statute, and section 4 does so remedy it.

I have been led far afield, however, from the decision I was reading.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. I take the liberty of refreshing the minds of the able Senator from Texas, the chairman of the committee, and the able Senator from Missouri, who is making a very full presentation of his ideas, by recalling to the recollection of each, if I am not in error, the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States, touching George W. Westinghouse, in the matter of a patent, held, if I remember the words, that a patent was not a contract whereof it might be said that it was either impaired or violated, but it was a privilege granted by the Government, subject at all times to be treated by that Government in the way of curtailing or enlarging whenever the necessities of the public or its advantages or its welfare called for it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I was merely inquiring of the Senator from Missouri what his opinion was with reference to the matter.

Mr. REED. I take it the Senator's remark just now evidently implies that he did not doubt the law, but he wanted to know what I thought about it.

Mr. CULBERSON. Oh, no. I have not given the subject full consideration myself, and I desired the opinion of the Senator from Missouri to help me reach a conclusion.

Mr. REED. I was going to say, if the Senator will pardon me, that for the moment he reminded me of the case of the gentleman who asked a young lady, as he fondly held her hand, if she would marry him. She responded, with considerable asperity, "No; I would not even think of marrying a man like you." He replied: "Well, don't get mad about it; I don't want to marry you. I only asked for information." [Laughter.]

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I merely wanted myself to give both distinguished Senators a suggestion as to where I thought they might find that the views of each had been sustained, and not to include myself in the argument.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator; and my own view was and is just as the Senator from Illinois has stated his investigation leads him to conclude. I am not a patent lawyer myself. I do not mean to say the Senator is, either. I know he is a very great lawyer.

Mr. LEWIS. I may say that if there is any one thing that is patent about me it is that I am not a patent lawyer. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Now, coming back to this decision—I still want to take a little time to present it—Chief Justice White continues:

> The illustrations might be multiplied indefinitely. That they are not imaginary is now a matter of common knowledge, for, as the result of a case decided some years ago by one of the circuit courts of appeal, which has been followed by cases in other circuit courts of appeal, to which reference will hereafter be made, what prior to the first of those decisions on a sale of a patented article was designated a condition of sale, governed by the general principles of law, has come in practice to be denominated a license restriction, thus, by the change of form, under the doctrine announced in the cases referred to, bringing the matters covered by the restriction within the exclusive sway of the patent law.
> As the transformation has come about in practice since the decisions in question, the conclusion is that it is attributable as an effect caused by the doctrine of those cases. And, as I have previously stated, it is a matter of common knowledge that the change has been frequently resorted to for the purpose of bringing numerous articles of common use within the monopoly of a patent when otherwise they would not have been embraced therein, thereby tending to subject the whole of society to a widespread and irksome monopolistic control.

I will ask the page to shut the door back of me, for I want the 12 Senators who are here not to be disturbed in their ruminations. I might just as well say, Mr. President, that the Senate of the United States is going to hear this argument, either in extenso or in brief, before it votes on this question. The Members of the Senate are going to vote with their eyes open. The roll is going to be called if I can get enough Members to second the call. Then I shall be content, and not until then.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	James	Norris	Swanson
Bankhead	Jones	Overman	Thomas
Bryan	Kenyon	Perkins	Thompson
Burton	Kern	Pomerene	Thornton
Camden	Lane	Ransdell	Vardaman
Chamberlain	Lee, Md.	Reed	Walsh
Clark, Wyo.	Lewis	Shafroth	West
Culberson	McCumber	Sheppard	White
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Shields
Gore	Myers	Shively
Hollis	Nelson	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators and Mr. CHILTON, Mr. OWEN, Mr. SMITH of Georgia, and Mr. TILLMAN answered to their names when called.

Mr. PITTMAN entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator that there is an existing order to that effect. The Sergeant at Arms is instructed to request the attendance of absent Senators under the existing order.

Mr. STONE, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I continue reading from this opinion for a moment and then I shall be through with that branch of my remarks. I am reading at length from the opinion because anything said by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States ought to challenge the thought of this body. Chief Justice White continued:

> What could more cogently serve to point to the reality and conclusiveness of these suggestions than do the facts of this case? It is admitted that the use of the ink to work the patented machine was not embraced in the patent, and yet it is now held that by contract the use of materials not acquired from a designated source has become an infringement of the patent, and exactly the same law is applied as though the patent in express terms covered the use of ink and other operative materials. If is not, as I understand it, denied; and if it were, in the face of the decision in the Miles Medical Co. case, supra, in reason it can not be denied that the particular contract which operates this result if tested by the general law would be void as against public policy. The contract, therefore, can only be maintained upon the assumption that the patent law and the issue of a patent is the generating source of an authority to contract to procure rights under the patent law not otherwise within that law, and which could not be enjoyed under the general law of the land.

Mr. President, that brings us to this: The Government of the United States may pass all the laws it desires to pass, all that can be conceived of by the ingenuity and patriotism of Congress, prohibiting monopolies, prohibiting restraint of trade, the several States of the Union may pass laws of similar kind and character, and yet if a man secures a patent he may cloak himself under the patent law, proceed to create a restraint of trade for his benefit upon subjects which are not at all included within the terms of his patent.

It follows that unless we strike down this evil by a substantive law limiting the operation of the patent laws it will be but a short time until this scheme, this legal legerdemain, will have proceeded to such a point that every kind of restraint of trade will be protected by a clause tying the article of trade in which it is desired to restrain to some patented article.

The evil, therefore, is one which ought to immediately demand the most serious thought of Congress. That it is a real and existing evil is shown by the fact that probably more cases have been brought by monopolists owning patents to prohibit those who have purchased or leased the patented device from buying in the open market, and probably more causes have been successfully maintained than have been brought and successfully maintained by the Government of the United States under the Sherman Act for the purpose of protecting the people of the country from monopoly.

We are now engaged in an attempt to strengthen the Sherman Act, to make that act more effective, to make it reach to practices which have hitherto not been thought to be covered by it. Weeks and months of the time of Congress has been devoted to that task. And yet, with the words of the Supreme Court ringing in our ears, with its express challenge of our attention, we proceed to allow this new scheme, concocted by monopolists for the purpose of defeating the antitrust acts, to go on and prosper and spread itself as a green bay tree. If Congress does that, it will, in my judgment, make a most serious mistake.

Mr. President, at this point I want to call the attention of the friends of the trade commission bill—and we are all friends of the trade commission bill, differing only in this, that some of us desiring a trade commission believed that the language of the act ought to be specifically framed, whereas others believed a general statement was sufficient. But addressing myself to the friends of the trade commission bill, to those who believe in its potentiality, I again ask them if there is one single man among them all who will claim under the general clause authorizing the prohibition of unfair trade practices that a right reserved under a statute of the United States can be stricken down by the trade commission or the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States that a certain practice is legal can be annulled.

But I challenge their thought to another phase of the subject. It is this: The rights reserved in the Clayton bill to an injured party are radically different from the rights reserved in the trade-commission bill to an injured party. Under the trade-commission bill an injured party has but one method of procedure. He can file a complaint with the commission. It is not even provided that he can be there represented by counsel. The commission, proceeding upon the complaint, will make such investigation as to it seems fit and proper, and having made its investigation, will thereupon write its judgment. And then what happens? If the judgment is not obeyed, the trade commission goes into a Federal court and brings a suit to enforce its decree. That suit will be brought in some of the inferior Federal courts, and thereupon an appeal, of course, will lie to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Until the case has gone to the court no judgment of the commission, no injunction of the commission, is effective. If at the end of all the litigation the judgment of the commissiou be affirmed, there is not a single penalty attached for dereliction of duty or for having failed to obey the mandate of the commission in the first instance.

Now, what does that naturally mean? It presents itself to me in two views: First, the attitude of the injured party or the complaining party and the hardship he is placed under; second, the certainty that the wrongdoer, being subject to no penalty, will litigate to the end of the chapter.

Speaking of the first of these observations, no man can be heard save before the commission alone. He can not go into the courts of his vicinage. The man from Montana or the man from Arizona who feels himself injured and desires to be heard under the trade commission act must come to Washington or send his complaint here; and, if he personally looks after it, he must make the long trip across this country to appear before this single tribunal and pray for his remedy and present his evidence, if, indeed, he is permitted to present it, either in person or through an attorney, for the commission might take its own course and proceed in its own way. I assume, however, that it will be a commission of fair men and that it will permit an injured party to appear, but he must undergo the hardship of the trip and the delay which will inevitably ensue.

Speaking of it from the other side, and with reference now to the wrongdoer, the wrongdoer will of course be willing to test the law out until the last word has been said by the Supreme Court of the United States; and why should he not? There is no penalty for failing to obey the mandate in the first instance; there is no penalty for the original wrongful act. The Sherman law fixes penalties; it subjects the offender to the pains and penalties of imprisonment and fine, but the trade commission law places no such burden upon the offending party.

Therefore, when you strike section 4 from this bill and relegate this question to the trade commission you wipe out every penalty and every punishment save and except that at the end of the long story of litigation an injunction may finally be issued. Do you think you will arrest the efforts of those gentlemen who are making their thousands and hundreds of thousands and millions of dollars by these artful schemes? Do you think you will stop them until they have gone to the end of the road, until four or five or six or seven years after the proceedings are instituted the Supreme Court shall have written its decision?

During all those years they will continue their practices. Why should they not? Each day they so continue they put money in their purses; each day they fatten their bank account; and at the end the worst that can happen is that they shall be compelled to stop and pay the costs of an appeal to the court.

That sort of remedy may be justified in the realm of uncertainty and vagueness which it is claimed this board will be able to enter, and to which it is claimed the advice of the board may be essential, but certainly such a tender philosophy ought not to be indulged for the benefit of those who, having acquired a patent, proceed under that patent to build up a monopoly in defiance of the spirit of the Sherman law and in defiance of the laws of all of the States of this Union in which its operations may be carried on.

Therefore, and for this consideration, as well as for the one I first advanced, namely, that it having been decided that these practices are legal under the patent laws, they can not be declared illegal by any court or by any tribunal until Congress shall act—for both of these reasons I say that section 4 should be restored, and should be restored in that vigorous and splendid shape in which it came to us from the House of Representatives, where a violation is punished by fine and imprisonment. What, sir, has come of the slogan of our campaign? Where are now those oracles of the platform who told us that the Democratic Party intended to fill the jails and penitentiaries of this country with those who create monopolies? Are you to turn these great conspirators over to the tender mercies of a trade commission, without authority to enforce its decrees, or are you, as to the greater evils, the more vicious wrongs, the plainer violations of the principles of law, to hold them to a responsibility in courts of justice sitting within the States of the injured parties? Restore section 4, and you can invoke the power of the court in your own judicial district and obtain relief that is reasonably swift and is certain in its results.

Mr. President, at this point I desire to read two telegrams. One was handed to me by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and is as follows:

PORTSMOUTH, OHIO, August 20, 1914.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
Highlands Apartments, Washington, D. C.:

We are advised that the Senate's action striking out section 4 of the Clayton bill will materially affect the shoe industry in case the bill is passed. We have previously registered our opposition to the Clayton bill, that if the business interests of the country are to be burdened by the regularity provision of this bill, we believe section 4 should be restored.

THE EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATION,
THE SELBY SHOE CO.,
IRVING DREW CO.,
EXCELSIOR SHOE CO.

I read a telegram addressed to myself from shoe manufacturers of St. Louis, Mo., as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., August 20, 1914.

Hon. JAMES B. REED,
Washington, D. C.:

We manufacture and sell shoes amounting to approximately $28,000,000 annually, but the Shoe Machinery Trust, controlling about 98 per cent of the essential machines, prevent competition in machinery by the most monopolistic control over every manufacturer of machine-made shoes. Section 4 of Clayton bill offers some relief. We earnestly urge restoration of section 4, thus enabling us to protect ourselves in court and gain commercial freedom. The present high toll demanded and collected by Machinery Trust is taken from consumers' pockets, for it must be figured on every pair of shoes. We want your help, and ask for positive legislation at this time.

INTERNATIONAL SHOE CO.

Mr. President, that brings me to the consideration of that particular phase of the question which may be referred to as the Shoe Machinery Trust. When the decision in the Dick case was decided the Government had pending, and still has pending, the case of the United States against the United Shoe Machinery Co. of New Jersey and other defendants. The Government is strennously trying to distinguish this case from the one to which I have just referred; but it is my opinion that the effort at distinguishing is a very difficult undertaking; and, without venturing an opinion as to what the courts may decide, it seems to me that the situation is so very doubtful that we ought at this time to remove that doubt, not only with reference to the class of cases to which I just referred, but to the Shoe Machinery case as well.

The Shoe Machinery Trust is probably one of the most exasperating illustrations of how these legal devices can be employed. Some years ago there were four or five concerns engaged in making shoe machinery. Some of them made one or more machines that performed certain functions in the manufacture of shoes; other concerns made machines that performed different functions. No one concern had a complete set of shoe machinery, as I understand. The point, however, is not very material at this moment. Thereupon, in much the same way that other trusts and combinations are formed, the United Shoe Machinery Co. was organized by combining all of the various companies to which I have referred. The United Shoe Machinery Co. has a capital stock of $25,000,000, of which two years or more ago there was some $20,850,000 issued.

In addition to that, a holding company known as the United Shoe Machinery Corporation was organized in 1905, with an authorized capital of $50,000,000, of which there has been issued $38,000,000. This combination thus brought within one control a complete set of the essential machines used in manufacturing the lower parts of the shoe; that is, all of the shoe except the uppers. Many of these machines are patented. I suppose it is a safe statement to make that some part of every one of these machines is patented, and under the doctrine of the decision that I have read you can tie an entire factory onto one patented handle or crank.

This concern, according to Poor's Manual of 1913, stood as follows:

The United Shoe Machinery Corporation, incorporated May 2, 1905, in New Jersey, to purchase all outstanding shares of the United Shoe Machinery Co. The corporation has now acquired practically all of the stock of the latter. For terms of exchange of stock, see Manual of Industrials for 1911, page 1376. The United Shoe Machinery Co. manufactures, sells, and leases shoe machinery, owning and controlling patents and inventions covering numerous types (over 300 kinds) of shoemaking machinery. In return for royalties and rentals received the company assumes the whole cost of invention, experimental work, development, manufacture, and depreciation of machines. Company's plant at Beverly, Mass., has a floor space of 21 acres, employing about 4,200 hands. In September, 1910, it issued $1,500,000 of common stock to acquire the shoe-machinery and shoe-manufacturing interests of Thomas G. Plant—

And so forth.

Now, Mr. President, without reading more—and Senators can find more information in Poor's Manual, at page 1077—I proceed to say that this company, owning three hundred and odd kinds of machines, could nevertheless not dominate the market but for the device I am about to discuss. It does now dominate the market; it is the most complete monopoly I know of, unless it be the zinc-oxide monopoly. It controls 99 per cent of the shoe-machinery business of the United States, and it does it in this wise: It has certain machines of a superior kind which perform some function in the process of manufacturing a shoe. It is also able to outfit an entire factory. It is thus able to compel every shoe manufacturer of the country to patronize it to some extent. Accordingly, when the shoe manufacturer comes to buy one of its machines it forces him to sign a contract which contains this clause:

The leased machinery shall be used for no other purpose than for lasting boots, shoes, or other footwear made by or for the lessee. The leased machinery shall not, nor shall any part thereof, be used in the manufacture or preparation of any welted boots, shoes, or other footwear or portions thereof—which have been or shall be welted in whole or in part or the soles in whole or in part stitched by the aid of any welt-sewing or sole-stitching machinery not held by the lessee under lease from the lessor, or in the manufacture or preparation of any turned boots, shoes, or other footwear or portions thereof the soles of which have been or shall be in whole or in part attached to their uppers by the aid of any turned-sewing machinery not held by the lessee under lease from the lessor, or in the manufacture of any boots, shoes, or other footwear which have or shall be in whole or in part pulled over, slugged, heel seat nailed, or otherwise partly made by the aid of any pulling-over or "metallic" machinery not held by the lessee under lease from the lessor.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds I should like to know if it is the idea of the Senator that that kind of a contract is justified by the decision in the case he has cited?

Mr. REED. I think it is. I say, however, that there has been an effort made, and the Government is making a most strenuous effort, to distinguish. Whether the Government will ever be able to distinguish is a question that we can answer accurately only when the courts have responded with their decisions.

Mr. WALSH. Can the Senator tell us now in what way the Government attempts to distinguish?

Mr. REED. I do not think I can at this moment with the accuracy and clearness with which I should like to make the statement.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator pardon me if I endeavor to state what it is?

Mr. REED. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. WALSH. My understanding about the matter is that the court ruled in the Typewriter case that the typewriter being patented, or a patented invention being used in it, a contract could be made with the purchaser of the typewriter that all supplies to be used in connection with that typewriter must be bought of the manufacturer, and that contract was justified. In the Shoe-machinery case they go beyond that, and require not only that all supplies used in connection with the patented machine shall be bought of the company, but that all other machinery that they have in their factory, patented or unpatented, must be bought of that particular company.

Mr. REED. And it will take a mind that is capable of making very fine distinctions to draw a line between the two cases. In the one case a man having a patented article stipulates that certain materials used upon that article shall be purchased from an individual. In the other case the stipulation is that certain machinery to be used in connection with the patented machine shall be purchased from an individual. Without undertaking to say that the Government will lose this suit, I do say that if it wins the suit it will be upon some very narrow and technical ground.

Why should we, who have the power to act, and act now, wait for the uncertainty of such a decision? If there were no such thing as a machinery trust, if there were no such thing as a machinery trust contract, if the question rested alone upon the line of decisions, of which the Dick case is typical and which hold that you can attach to a patented article a condition compelling the owner of the article to use goods that are unpatented, but are sold by the owner of the patent upon the machine, even if that is the extent of the wrong, why should it be permitted to go on? What right have we to allow the continuance of a rule of that character when we can in a few moments of time wipe it out? Why should we leave it to the uncertainty of courts, to the refinements of judges and lawyers, when there is vested in our hands the power and the authority to remedy the wrong?

I call attention again to the language of Chief Justice White, because I want to impress upon the Senate the importance of the subject, even if we exclude the Shoe Machinery Trust. I call attention again to his language, in which he says that under the doctrine that is now established the patentees selling an engine may, under the patent laws, contract that all the coal used on the engine shall be purchased from a certain man; that a carpenter purchasing a plane might be held to be bound to use lumber furnished by the man who sold the plane, and so on through the long list of illustrations he has given. Then I call attention to his statement that he writes this opinion in part to make it clear that—and I quote—

If evils arise, their continuance will not be caused by the interpretation now given to the statute but will result from the inaction of the legislative department in failing to amend the statute so as to avoid such evils.

Mr. President, why not restore section 4? It puts no restriction upon fair and honest trade. It places the patentee of an article where it was originally intended that he should be placed, in a position where he can manufacture his article and sell it to whomsoever he pleases. It only says to him, "Because the Government has given you a patent entitling you alone to manufacture a certain article, you can not, under that generous grant of the Government, set up a scheme which, in effect, destroys the general law of the land."

I come back, however, to state once more the position I have so often stated. I come to those Senators who voted to strike out section 4, in the belief that section 5 of the trade commission bill would reach this evil, with the appeal that, in view of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, these particular practices are legal; in view of the fact that the Supreme Court bottoms the right to engage in these practices upon the statutes of the United States; in view of the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has said there is but one place where a remedy can be had, and that is in Congress; in view of all this, I ask Senators to agree with me that section 4 must be restored, because a trade commission certainly can not declare to be illegal that which the Supreme Court of the United States has said is a legal right, bottomed upon a statute of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri has made a very substantial and very valuable contribution to this debate in inviting the attention of the Senate to the importance of making some provision to meet the conditions which were presented to the Supreme Court in the Typewriter case to which he has adverted. I am not entirely certain that section 5 of the trade commission bill, which denounces as unlawful all forms of unfair competition, would not now make illegal that which was legal when the decision of the Supreme Court was rendered.

Mr. President, it is expected by those who believe there is efficacy in section 5 of the trade commission bill that many practices which can not now be denounced as illegal, but which are revolting to a refined public conscience, will be held to be denounced by that act. Of course I appreciate very well that in this view the Senator from Missouri does not concur; but upon that matter the Senate has evinced a conviction contrary to the opinion that was entertained by him. I address myself to those Senators who believe there is efficacy in the provisions of section 5 of the trade commission bill.

It happens that one of the many practices heretofore tolerated under the law came before the Supreme Court, which held that in the then state of the law that particular practice was not illegal. I apprehend that if the matter of local price cutting had ever come before the Supreme Court of the United States and one had been shown to have sold goods within a certain specified locality at considerably less than their actual cost, with the necessary and legitimate consequence of practically driving a weak competitor out of business, that particular act probably would be declared by the Supreme Court of the United States not in itself to be illegal. Take the matter, for instance, of espionage. You can very readily understand that many methods of espionage could not be denounced by any court before which they came as a violation of either the civil or the criminal law so as to subject the individual guilty of them either to damages or to punishment in the ordinary course of the law. Whether, then, it will be held that by virtue of section 5 of the trade commission act we have made unlawful that which at the time of the rendition of the decision to which the attention of the Senate has been called was entirely legal I do not undertake to say.

I fully agree with the Senator from Missouri that we should take no chances whatever upon that matter, and that there should be a distinct provision in the bill now under consideration which will put contracts of that character under the ban of the law.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] introduced a bill on this subject, as he has told us, during the last session of Congress, and with very few changes it will answer all the purposes of a section of this bill, which will take care of the features to which our attention is now addressed by the Senator from Missouri. I shall myself offer an amendment of that character, and hope to get for it the approbation of the committee. It will, however, be a simple declaration that just exactly the kind of contract which was considered by the Supreme Court in the case to which the Senator now calls our attention is unlawful. Thereafter there will be no question at all about it.

Mr. President, I want to say with reference to that subject that the more I have reflected upon this matter the more I am convinced that when that feature of the case is taken care of section 4 ought not to be restored to this bill. I instanced a while ago, in the course of a colloquy with the Senator from Missouri, the conditions which might arise in the case of what is known as exclusive agencies, where one struggling against a practical monopoly already established is met with the absolute necessity, in order to get his goods before the people at all, of establishing an exclusive agency, of putting the handling of those goods in the hands of a man who will contract not to sell the goods of any other manufacturer of the same character, in order that he may the more diligently press the adoption of those goods upon the trading public. But, Mr. President, in the report of the House committee we are assured—and that assurance seems to me a sound one—that the present bill does not denounce exclusive-agency contracts. It is said that the bill has nothing to do with agencies, but deals only with the case of commodities sold, leased, or contracted for sale. But, Mr. President, exactly the same conditions obtain under those circumstances that obtain in the case of the exclusive contract.

An instance was called to my attention by the junior Senator from the State of New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], who has an intimate acquaintance with that feature of the case. He says, for instance, that Clark's and Coats's thread are the standards upon the market. Every housewife knows about those threads. We all understand that Clark and Coats are in a combination, which is now practically a trust, and to a very great extent a monopoly, if not a complete monopoly.

Some one, recognizing the disfavor into which those brands have fallen by reason of their control by this monopoly, goes to work and establishes a business and manufactures a thread in every way the equal of the thread put out by that institution, and he wants to get it before the public. A general dealer has Jones's thread, he has Clark's thread, and he has Coats's thread. The housewife goes there, and she wants a spool of thread. She is asked which she wants, and, of course, she wants either Clark's or Coats's. They say, "Try Jones's thread; it is just as good, madam; we would like to sell you that thread." She says, "Oh, no; I do not want anything just as good; I want the real thing." So she will not buy the new thread at all. Everyone must recognize that the new man seeking to get into business in opposition to a monopoly already established has to make some extra inducements to merchants to take his thread and to take no other kind of thread, and to press it upon the market and upon his customers with all the eloquence and skill as a salesman that he can command.

Therefore, Mr. President, I think it would be unwise in us to denounce under any and all circumstances that may possibly arise the sale of an article with a contract that the goods of no other manufacturer in the same line should be handled by him who buys. In other words, Mr. President, I believe we ought to leave to the trade commission the question as to whether, under the particular circumstances of the case, it is unfair competition or is not unfair competition; to enjoin and restrain it whenever it seems to promote monopoly and allow it to be exercised with perfect freedom when the effort is made to overcome the exactions of a monopoly. That, Mr. President, is the reason why I think the provision ought to be restored.

Now, let me speak for a moment about the other provision. I think the provision to which the attention of the Senate has been called needs to be taken care of. The feature to which your attention is invited, which is presented by the operations of the shoe machinery company, is being very properly taken care of. They have established a monopoly by the methods which have been indicated by the Senator. The original decision simply covered the ground that whenever one owns a patented machine he may by a contract require any purchaser of the machine to buy from him all the supplies necessary for the operation of that machine.

It never went so far as to provide that he must buy every other article of furniture in his store or in his office. For instance, here is a man who manufactures typewriters. It is a patented machine. He can require me as a lawyer, if I desire to buy his machine, to enter into an agreement with him that I will buy all my carbon paper from him, all my stationery used in connection with it, all the ink that I use in connection with it, but he can not compel me to agree, nor would such a contract made with me be lawful, that I must buy all my office furniture from him; that I must buy all my law books from him; that I must buy the coal from him that I burn in the stove in my office, nor the water that is supplied, nor the towels with which I wipe my hands. Those things he can not do, and no court will ever determine that a contract of that character is anything except a contract contrary to public policy.

Mr. REED. If I do not interrupt the Senator——

Mr. WALSH. Not at all.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks we ought to sanction the very practice he last described; that is, a man selling a typewriter and then stipulating that the owner of the typewriter must buy the paper and supplies from the man who sold the typewriter?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly not. I agree with the Senator that that should be condemned.

Mr. REED. The Senator says that the doctrine has never been extended to anything except the supplies that are to be used on the particular machine. At the risk of being wearisome, I call the Senator's attention to the views of Chief Justice White.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes; I understand the Chief Justice held that many evil consequences would flow from it, and the fact that the decision was very much more ample than the majority of the court declared.

Mr. REED. I call attention to the language. I do not say that it is necessarily sound, I do not say it is necessarily controlling; but I do say that if, in the opinion of the great majority, these results would follow which he states, we ought as wise legislators to remove that danger. This is the language of the Chief Justice:

> I do not think it necessary to stop to point out the innumerable subjects which will be susceptible of being removed from the operation of State judicial power, and the fundamental and radical character of the change which must come as a result of the principle decided. But, nevertheless, let me give a few illustrations:
>
> Take a patentee selling a patented engine. He will now have the right by contract to bring under the patent laws all contracts for coal or electrical energy used to afford power to work the machine or even the lubricants employed in its operation. Take a patented carpenter's plane. The power now exists in the patentee by contract to validly confine a carpenter purchasing one of the planes to the use of lumber sawed from trees grown on the land of a particular person or sawed by a particular mill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I merely want to say I do not claim that the opinion of Chief Justice White upon that point stated particularly in the way of argument is any more controlling than the opinion of any Senator who has considered the subject, but it is potential. However, I should like to call the Senator's attention to this language in the majority opinion, at page 40:

> It does not matter how unreasonable or how absurd the conditions are. It does not matter what they are, if he says at the time when the purchaser proposes to buy or the person to take a license: "Mind, I only give you this license on this condition," and the purchaser is free to take it or leave it, as he likes. If he takes it, he must be bound by the condition. It seems to be common sense, and not to depend upon any patent law or any other particular law.

That is a quotation from the Cantelo case, what Mr. Justice Wills said, which the court seemed to approve.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have but little in addition to say. I agree with the Senator that that particular matter ought to be taken care of, and I read the bill offered by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] in the Sixty-second Congress, which, in my judgment, completely meets the situation. It is brief, and is as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That it shall not be lawful to insert a condition in any contract relating to the sale, lease, or license to use any article or process protected by a patent or patents, the effect of which will be to prohibit or restrict the purchaser, lessee, or licensee from using any article or class of articles, whether patented or not, or any patented process, supplied or owned by any person other than the seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees, and any such seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees, who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.
> SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful to insert a condition in any contract relating to the sale, lease, or license to use any article or process protected by a patent or patents, the effect of which will be to require the purchaser, lessee, or licensee to acquire from the seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees, any article or class of articles not protected by the patent, and any such condition shall be null and void as being in restraint of trade and contrary to public policy; and any such seller, lessor, or licensor, or his nominees, who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court.

I shall offer this bill with the penal provisions taken out of it as an amendment to the pending bill in order to meet, as I think it largely meets, the objection now urged by the Senator from Missouri. I will say in explanation that I shall ask the penal provisions to be excluded, because we have not attached any penal provision whatever to any form of unfair competition, and I do not want to subject the patentee to any harsher restrictions or limitations than the man who sells a machine which is not patented. The man who sells a machine which is not patented and couples with it a provision that all other machinery in the factory in which it goes be bought from him is simply subject to injunction by the trade commission, and we ought to put the patentee upon the same footing as the man who deals in the unpatented article with reference to that.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator takes his seat I should like to get his views a little further on one matter. He expressed a doubt as to whether section 5 of the trade commission bill might not have changed the laws as declared by the Supreme Court in the case we are referring to. That decision is based upon a statute of the United States. Does the Senator think that the general language of section 5 may repeal the law as declared by a court based upon that statute?

Mr. WALSH. The Senator read us a number of times the declaration of the court to the effect that the practice was not illegal, that if it was to be made so it must be by the act of Congress. I suggested the possibility, at least, of the construction of section 5, namely, that section 5 of the interstate-commerce act might be construed as thus supplying the legislation which the Supreme Court said was necessary in order to make that illegal.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if it is true or if it is a matter that may be true in the opinion of the Senator, then it follows that if section 5 has repealed the law as declared by the Supreme Court and has changed the law of patents as it stands in the patent statutes, we may have repealed every trust act that has ever been put upon the statute books, and every trust decision, and taken away from the courts every authority and vested it all in this commission. If that is the case, we are certainly treading on very dangerous ground.

Mr. WALSH. I should not think the conclusion would follow at all, and for myself I have no apprehension.

Mr. CULBERSON. On the contrary, the provision of the trade commission bill expressly denies that that construction shall be placed upon the bill.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator has confined his remarks very largely to the provisions of section 4—in fact, as my recollection is, entirely to the provisions of section 4. But, Mr. President, the motion to reconsider embraces section 2 as well as section 4, and section 2 refers to that form of unfair competition generally denominated as local price cutting. The motion to reconsider, if it prevails, embraces section 2 as well as section 4.

Perhaps the most conspicuous offender in the matter of unfair competition by local price cutting has been the great Standard Oil Co. As illustrative of how very difficult it is to frame a statute which will reach what we desire to reach in these particular instances, let me call your attention to a criticism of section 2 as it stands in the bill that is made by some of the competitors and rivals left in the field of the Standard Oil Co. I read a letter recently received from the Independent Petroleum Marketers' Association of the United States. The writer says:

> As you perhaps have heard, the independent oil men of the country are directly interested in section 2 of the so-called Clayton bill, because that is what we have called the "antidiscrimination law," and which we have caused to be placed on the books of perhaps a score of States in the last 8 or 10 years.

The Senate has heretofore been advised that my own State is one of those which has enacted a statute of that character. He continues:

> Since the Clayton bill has been in the Judiciary Committee of the House we have been trying to get consideration for an amendment to section 2 which would define the word "transportation" in line 16, page 3, of the bill as reported out by the Senate Judiciary Committee on July 22, so that discrimination in prices between purchasers would be only to the extent of the difference in the cost of "common-carrier transportation." The Standard Oil Co. has tried to make out that the word "transportation" meant all carrying costs, and has endeavored to take advantage of their interpretation of the word and vary their prices to the extent of an alleged difference in their cartage cost, which difference we have maintained is purely fictitious and have shown that it exists only at points of greatest competition with our members.
>
> Now, I notice that the Senate Judiciary Committee, to whom this association addressed some letters on the subject of our proposed amendment some several weeks ago, has gone, in our opinion, even further than the Standard Oil Co.'s interpretation of the word "transportation" and permitted a difference to the extent of not only the "selling cost," but also to "meet competition." In our opinion, these two provisos are entirely too vague and undefinable, and we believe that they would permit such a company as the Standard Oil Co. to vary the prices very much at will and that it would be almost impossible to make a case against them.
> In fact, the last amendment, permitting "discrimination to meet competition" simply, in our opinion, legalizes what the Standard Oil Co. was noted for in the past and what it is doing, in a measure, to-day—that is, cut prices to meet competition. Not necessarily to meet the competitor's prices, because the amendment says nothing about the competitor's prices.
> Frankly, it is our opinion at the present time that that committee's amendment to section 2 makes it absolutely worthless, but undoubtedly there must have been some argument for the amendments or the majority would not have included them. I would be glad to go down to Washington and talk this over with you if you think it would be at all worth while.

I did not invite the gentleman to come. I call your attention to this merely for the purpose of showing that the very greatest kind of a controversy will arise at the very outset concerning what this statute which we have proposed means and likewise as to whether it meets the requirements of the case at all.

I believe that when we have dealt with the whole subject of unfair competition and allow the trade commission to take up each individual case and to inquire into the particular facts of that case, we have done wisely, and that we ought not now within the narrow terms of a statute attempt to define the particular varieties of unfair competition which we thus seek to prevent and suppress.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I said to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] this morning that I would be glad if he would call up the motion he had entered to reconsider the votes of the Senate striking out sections 2 and 4 of the pending bill so that the matter might be disposed of to-day before I should be obliged to leave the city. This he kindly did as soon as circumstances permitted, but as I shall have to leave the Senate within the next 10 minutes I fear that I can not be present when the vote is taken on the motion nor have any opportunity of expressing my views with respect to those sections.

I have believed, Mr. President, that the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary acted wisely in leaving these sections out of the bill, and I intended by my vote to support their action. The whole afternoon has been taken up in a very interesting and able debate devoted chiefly to a reargument of the trade commission bill. We went over all the questions involved here when that bill was up for consideration, when amendments were offered to it embodying substantially the more important features of the sections that have been dropped from the pending bill. The Senate declined to put them in that measure, and I think acted wisely in that behalf.

These sections were put into the pending bill before the trade commission bill had been acted upon, before it was known what might be done or even proposed in that measure. I think, with the Judiciary Committee, that every precaution has been taken that it is wise to attempt in the provisions of the trade commission bill.

I believe, Mr. President, that sections 2 and 4 would operate to the advantage of those great concerns that we are wont to denounce as monopolies, and would bring to them in the long run more benefit than it would to anybody else. It is possible that drastic provisions of the kind embodied in sections 2 and 4 might tend to remedy an evil, or what many people would regard as an evil, here and there. On the other hand, I think there can be no kind of doubt that it would result almost certainly in doing undeserved and unmerited harm, or at least that it might be used to that end in doing injury to younger, weaker, struggling industries that are striving to establish themselves. If I had the time, Mr. President, to do what I had intended if I had secured the opportunity, I believe I could demonstrate the truth of the statement I have just made. Now, I can not enter upon the discussion of the question, for within two minutes I am obliged to leave. I wish I could have an opportunity to register my vote in opposition to the motion to reconsider, but I can not have that privilege.

Mr. President, I think it the wise thing to do to follow the lead of the Judiciary Committee, which has given attentive and most thoughtful consideration to this whole subject, and not to venture, somewhat blindly, into experiments that may result in infinitely more harm to the public, to the people generally, than good.

That is all I have time to say, but since I can not vote on this motion, I have taken these four or five minutes, at least, to register my judgment against these provisions of the bill.

Mr. CULBERSON. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to reconsider the votes striking out sections 2 and 4 of the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, there are a few Senators who desire to be heard on this motion. They are not ready to speak to-night; in fact, I think one of them is not present, and I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he will not permit the vote to go over until to-morrow. Of course, I could proceed and occupy the floor until 6 o'clock, but I should prefer not to speak until to-morrow.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, August 22, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, August 21, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Lord God of hosts, look down from Thy throne of grace with patience upon Thine erring children, and have compassion upon them. Thou knowest us altogether, our weakness, our vanity, and the sins which doth so easily beset us. Rebuke the haughty, humble the arrogant, expose the hypocrite, undo the egotist, give strength for weakness, wisdom for foolishness, faith for doubt, hope for dispair, love for hate; for where faith is there is confidence, where hope is there is progress, where love is there is peace. Thus rule and overrule, that Thy will may be done to the glory and honor of Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri was called, and he answered "Present."

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 220 Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The Chair will state for the information of all concerned that the reason there was such a large number who did not answer to their names when called was because the bells were out of fix and we had to temporize and arrange so as to notify Members over in the House Office Building.

BILLS ON THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. GREGG. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 107, noes none.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar in order to-day, with Mr. BARNHART in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6880) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Florine A. Albright.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, on a previous day that bill passed the Committee of the Whole House and was laid aside with a favorable recommendation, and has never been reported to the House; so there is nothing more for the Committee of the Whole House to do with reference to that bill. The bill has been laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that bill was reported to the House.

Mr. GREGG. And it has never been acted upon by the House, and there is nothing before the committee.

Mr. MANN. It is not pending in the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next bill.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolution of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 14155. An act to amend an act of Congress approved March 28, 1900 (vol. 31, Stat. L., p. 52), entitled "An act granting to the State of Kansas the abandoned Fort Hays Military Reservation, in said State, for the purpose of establishing an experiment station of the Kansas State Agricultural College, and a western branch of the State Normal School thereon, and for a public park."

H. J. Res. 246. Joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of War to grant a revocable license for the use of lands adjoining the national cemetery near Nashville, Tenn., for public-road purposes.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 6315. An act to authorize the Great Western Land Co., of Missouri, to construct a bridge across Black River; and

S. 5673. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911.

NATHANIEL F. CHEAIRS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8696) for the relief of Nathaniel F. Cheairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Nathaniel F. Cheairs, of Columbia, Maury County, Tenn., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $12,319.47, in full compensation for the net proceeds of cotton sold by the Government in 1864 and placed in the Treasury of the United States, and in accordance with the findings heretofore made by the Court of Claims.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON].

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, this is a case in which Nathaniel F. Cheairs, a citizen of Columbia, Tenn., had 50 bales of cotton taken from him by the Federal Army. This cotton was sold by the Federal officers, and the proceeds, after deducting expenses, were paid into the Treasury of the United States. Now, we have the finding of the Court of Claims establishing the fact of the amount and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury. It appears, Mr. Chairman, that Nathaniel F. Cheairs was in the Confederate Army. It further appears that the President of the United States granted a pardon to the claimant, that he took the oath of amnesty according to the offer made in the proclamation made by the President of the United States, and that he complied with all of its terms. Now, under that state of facts there is no reason why this money, which is now in the Treasury, should not be paid over to Mr. Cheairs. I might say that this claim was filed after the holding of the United States Supreme Court that the taking of this oath under this pardon of the President was a full release from all offenses, and the party did not know his standing in court in time to file his claim within the time the statute of limitation would run. I believe that is all I have to say now. I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. MANN. Not yet, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MANN. Well, hardly. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield the floor?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir; for the present. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the measure?

Mr. MANN. I expect to do so.

Mr. HOUSTON. I yield to the gentleman so much time as he may desire.

Mr. MANN. I do not ask the gentleman to yield any time to me.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] rise?

Mr. MANN. To ascertain whether the gentleman from Tennessee has yielded the floor or not.

Mr. HOUSTON. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] reserves the balance of his time. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Nathaniel F. Cheairs the sum of $12,318.47, stated to be in full compensation for the net proceeds of cotton sold by the Government in 1864 and placed in the Treasury of the United States, and stated to be in accordance with the findings heretofore made by the Court of Claims. The case involves a proposition affecting hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of claims. It ought to be very carefully considered by Congress before it is enacted. The report shows that the claimant had 50 bales of cotton taken from him by the United States Army, which was sold by United States officers, and the proceeds, after deducting all expenses, were paid into the United States Treasury, and they have not been paid out. It is stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and found by the Court of Claims, that the sum placed in the Treasury, after deducting expenses, and so forth, is the sum named in the bill—$12,318.47. Claimant was an officer, or, at least, was in the Confederate Army, but on application he received a special pardon from the President of the United States. He took the oath of allegiance required by the terms of the pardon, which is on file in the office of the Secretary of State, who acknowledged the receipt of the same. He notified the Secretary of State that he accepted the terms of said pardon in good faith. The committee finds that he has complied with the conditions of the pardon from the time he accepted it, and it is stated that he so testified in his deposition now on file in the Court of Claims, and the committee finds that, therefore, he was loyal and restored to all of his rights in his property. And the claim is made that anyone who was disloyal to the Government during the Rebellion, but who was afterwards pardoned, is thereby rendered innocuous from the disloyalty. As a matter of fact, while there was a special pardon granted in this case, there is a general pardon by statute as to all persons who served in the Confederate Army or who were otherwise disloyal. And the claim now, as made by the committee in this case, that an officer or other person whose property was taken and who was disloyal during the Rebellion has his disloyalty removed by a pardon, would go to the extent, if followed out logically, of removing the disloyalty in all claims against the Government for property taken during the Civil War.

Gentlemen can not fail to note, in the last few days in the newspaper reports of the war in Europe, that armies are not too particular when in an enemy's country about property they destroy or property which they take. Probably the Union Army was not any more particular than armies in civilized countries usually are. Hundreds of millions, if not thousands of millions, of property was taken or destroyed during the war. That is one of the inevitable effects of war. There are some people who have grown to imagine during the last few years of peace in the world that war is a kind of pink-tea affair, where combatants, at a convenient and safe distance from each other, only fire harmless bullets or balls at each other. But that is not the way war is conducted.

Now, it being one of the inevitable effects of war, it has universally been held that when property belonging to the enemy or belonging to those persons who had adhered to the enemy as a part of the conduct of the war is taken or destroyed, they had no claim for the payment of the damages or for the property taken. Yet we are told now that because this claimant, who was, as I recall, an officer, although I am not sure about that—I think the gentleman from Tennessee stated that he was an officer——

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not sure whether he was an officer or not.

Mr. MANN. He was in the Confederate Army, anyway. I am not sure whether he was an officer or not. It is claimed that because he was pardoned and restored to his civil rights—as everybody now is who took part in the War of the Rebellion—therefore he has a claim against the Government for property which was taken from him, which he would not have had if he had not received a pardon. Now, as a matter of fact, there is no distinction between his case and all the other cases. We provide in the statutes for reference of certain claims by the different Houses of Congress to the Court of Claims for findings of facts, and provide in the law that the claimant must assert and prove his loyalty.

Of course, we are not bound here, in passing upon a particular claim, by any statute which we may make in reference to the Court of Claims. We can pay anybody we please, out of the National Treasury, any sum we please on any excuse we please, or without any excuse at all. But if Congress undertakes to pay the claims of citizens in the South who had their property taken or destroyed by the armies of the North, they being in sympathy with the Confederate States, we will have to find ways of raising more than $100,000,000 a year, the sum it is suggested the European war will cause us to raise.

There was much more than $100,000,000 worth of property destroyed in the South each year. There were vast sums of value lost. The Southern States lay stricken at the end of the war, so far as their commercial and agricultural prosperity was involved. It might be generous for us to pay that all back; but generosity in the world has never yet gone to the extent of the army which succeeds, or the country which succeeds, paying to the losers all the damage which accrued. When the Franco-German War ended Germany required France to pay, I think, about $1,000,000,000—5,000,000,000 francs. That looked pretty harsh, but who would dream that at the end of the war Germany should be called upon to pay to France the damage which the German army had caused to French property and French citizenship?

The committee says:

In the case of Paddleford v. The United States the Supreme Court of the United States, in 9 Wallace, 540, and in the case of Kline v. The United States, and 92 United States, 653, 13 Wallace, 137, decided that said fund was a trust fund, and that the effect of a pardon and compliance with its terms rendered the offender as innocent as if he had never committed the offense; that it made no difference whether the property had been seized before or after the oath had been taken. (See H. Rept. No. 1203, 60th Cong., 1st sess., Hamiter claim.)

And the committee sets out the pardon which was granted by Andrew Johnson, President, dated September 30, 1865. That was after the war had ceased, practically ceased. It reads:

ANDREW JOHNSON, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

Whereas N. F. Cheairs, of Columbia, Tenn., by taking part in the late rebellion against the Government of the United States, has made himself liable to heavy pains and penalties;

And whereas the circumstances of his case render him a proper object of Executive clemency;

Now, therefore, be it known that I, Andrew Johnson, President of the United States of America, in consideration of the premises, divers other good and sufficient reasons me thereunto moving, do hereby grant to the said N. F. Cheairs a full pardon and amnesty for all offenses by him committed arising from participation, direct or implied, in the said rebellion, conditioned as follows:

First. This pardon to be of no effect until the said N. F. Chealrs shall take the oath prescribed in the proclamation of the President, dated May 29, 1865.

Second. To be void and of no effect if the said N. F. Chealrs shall hereafter, at any time, acquire any property whatever in slaves or make use of slave labor.

Third. That the said N. F. Chealrs first pay all costs which may have accrued in any proceedings instituted or pending against his person or property before the date of acceptance of this warrant.

Fourth. That the said N. F. Chealrs shall not by virtue of this warrant claim any property or the proceeds of any property that has been sold by order, judgment, or decree of any court under the confiscation laws of the United States.

Fifth. That the said N. F. Chealrs shall notify the Secretary of State, in writing, that he has received and accepted the foregoing pardon.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto signed my name and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 30th day of September, A. D. 1865, and of the independence of the United States the ninetieth.

[SEAL.] ANDREW JOHNSON.

By the President:

WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State.

The committee finds that because he was granted this pardon in September, 1865, N. F. Chealrs is not barred, by reason of his participation on the Confederate side, from making a claim for property which was seized by the Army of the United States and sold prior to that time. It may be that my ingenious friends from Tennessee or other portions of the South, or from Texas—I do not mean to say that Texas is not in the South—will find some method of differentiating between this case and all other cases where property was taken, where pardon has been granted by act of Congress instead of by act of the President.

Now, are we going to pay all these claims? It will not be long, if we pay a few claims like this, until we are asked to pay, with a great deal more justice in the claims, for the value of the slaves which were made free. A great deal can be said in favor of the proposition. The property in slaves was destroyed by the proclamation of President Lincoln and the amendments to the Constitution of the United States. At one stroke of the pen men were made penniless who before had thousands of dollars of property in the form of slaves.

We hold no feeling against them. They are in full citizenship, with all the rights of any citizen in any place in the United States. Although 50 years have elapsed, and the bitterness and passion of the Civil War have passed away, I do not believe that the Government of the United States is called upon to pay for the property destroyed, or the property seized and used, or the property seized and sold, belonging to those who were fighting on the other side. If they had won, the property in the North that was destroyed would never have been paid for by the Confederate States—properly not paid for. Therefore I am opposed to the passage of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] stated in the opening part of his speech that this bill involved the payment of a character of claims covering hundreds of millions of dollars. The gentleman's statement on that was about as nearly accurate and correct as other statements that he made. The facts are that a statement made by the Treasury Department of the United States, prepared by officials who are supposed, at least, to be unfriendly, shows that it involves only $4,208,000. The gentleman only missed the truth by about $96,000,000; that is all.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is speaking now only of the cotton claims.

Mr. GREGG. The gentleman from Illinois stated that this bill involved claims that amounted to hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. MANN. I am sorry the gentleman did not listen to me——

Mr. GREGG. I took it down at the time——

Mr. MANN. Because he would have received much enlightenment if he had. The gentleman will pardon me; he has the time. I stated that the allowance of claims based upon the granting of a pardon, and thereby the removal of disloyalty, would involve hundreds of millions of claims.

Mr. GREGG. I do not know where the gentleman got those figures.

Now, the gentleman speaks a great deal about property taken and property destroyed. There is no desire on the part of anybody to pay for property destroyed as an act of war. Bills of that character are not favorably reported.

Now, the gentleman says that, as to property taken, it has been universally construed that for property taken from the enemy the enemy has no claim. That is not true. For a hundred years the rule of civilized warfare has been that if you take from the enemy stores and supplies that are useful to the army and use them the Government taking them is liable to the enemy for their value. That has been the rule of civilized warfare for a hundred years.

When we invaded Mexico we followed that rule. We paid the Mexicans on their soil for all the supplies and provisions that we took for the use of our Army. Wellington observed the same rule when he participated in the great Napoleonic wars. It has been the rule of civilized warfare, I say, for a hundred years, and no one purporting or claiming to be familiar with such law will deny it.

Now, then, leaving all that aside, here is what this case involves, and I want you gentlemen to listen to me for a minute: In 1863 Congress passed what is called the captured and abandoned property act. That act provided for gathering up certain property in the South and capturing certain other property. After it was gathered up it was to be sold and the money deposited in the Treasury. That was done. That law, however, had this provision: It provided that the owner of the property would have the right to sue within two years after the close of the war. It also provided that the owner must prove the ownership and prove that "he had never given any aid or comfort to the present rebellion."

Now, then, a suit came up on that. A man whose property had been seized and sold and the money put into the Treasury brought a suit. The Government appealed on a question of fact. The upper court held that he was not loyal, but it held that notwithstanding the fact that he was not loyal, his propery having been sold and the money deposited in the Treasury and he having been pardoned by the President his property rights vested in him, and the Supreme Court of the United States gave him a judgment for the money in the Treasury which represented the property that had been taken from him.

Now, if the gentlemen on that side or on this side have any doubt about that they will find the first case deciding that question was the Kline case (13 Wall., 138). Then there is the Armstrong case (13 Wall., 154). Then there is the Barcue case (13 Wall., 156) and the Carlisle case (13 Wall., 647). Then there is the Young case (97 U. S., 39).

Now, then, in all of these cases the Supreme Court has held that this money in the Treasury was a trust fund and belonged to the parties whose property was sold and the proceeds deposited in the Treasury.

In this particular case it is shown that the property was seized. It was not destroyed, it was not consumed. It was sold, and the proceeds were put in the Treasury, and they are there now, and the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the proceeds belong to this man; that he is entitled to them; and the only question for us to decide is whether we can forget that the war is over and refuse to hold up this man, or whether we are willing to follow the highest court of this land and restore to this man his simple rights. That is all. It is not a question of benevolence. It is not a question of generosity. It is a question of right. Now, will you hold him up, or will you do right by him? That is all there is for you to decide. His property is there. You have possession of it. The courts have held repeatedly that it is his. Now, simply because you have the might, will you rob him of what belongs to him?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. What was the proceeding by which this property was taken and sold?

Mr. GREGG. Under the captured and abandoned property act of 1863 the agents of the Government took this property, and they sold it in different markets, deducted the expense of sale and collection and all expenses connected with it, and deposited the net amount in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. And that proceeding was followed in this particular case, was it?

Mr. GREGG. Yes; that was followed in this case, and the money is now in the Treasury.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Does this fourth clause in the warrant of pardon, issued by the President, apply to this case? I presume the gentleman is familiar with it. It says:

Fourth. That the said N. F. Chealrs shall not by virtue of this warrant claim any property or the proceeds of any property that has been sold by order, judgment, or decree of any court under the confiscation laws of the United States.

Mr. GREGG. Will the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] answer that question?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will state to the gentleman that the findings of the court show that—

None of the property of N. F. Chealrs was ever sold by the order, judgment, or decree of court under the confiscation laws of the United States.

So it does not come within that clause.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. That is what I was trying to get at. That is why I asked the gentleman what the proceeding was by which the property of this man was taken and disposed of.

Mr. GREGG. I know the general proceeding, but I do not know the details. The gentleman from Tennessee will have to answer that.

Mr. HOUSTON. I can not give the gentleman the particulars. We have the general facts established that this cotton was seized by the Federal Army and by its officers, as set out in the findings of the court; that it was sold; and after deducting all the expenses of the sale, transporting the cotton to Cincinnati, perhaps, or some other point, the net sum realized was $12,318.47, which sum was turned into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. What was the procedure taken in the case? Can not the gentleman be more specific in describing the procedure?

Mr. HOUSTON. I can not give the gentleman the details of the proceeding. It was done in accordance with the act of Congress passed in 1863, authorizing the taking of captured and abandoned property and selling it, and turning the proceeds into the Treasury. Just the particular steps that were taken in this case I am not able to state, further than is shown by the findings of the Court of Claims.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The reading of this would lead one to think that the warrant of pardon, if that is the proper term to apply to it, was issued with the express understanding and upon the express condition that the one to whom it was issued should make no claims for property taken, and the warrant says that it shall be in force only in case the one to whom it is issued accepts all the conditions contained in it. And Mr. Cheairs wrote to the Secretary of State the following letter, in which he signifies his acceptance of the same, and all the conditions contained in it:

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 1, 1865.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the President's warrant of pardon bearing date September 30, 1865, and hereby signify my acceptance of the same, with all the conditions therein specified.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

N. F. CHEAIRS.

It would look very much to me as if he had waived any claim for property taken from him under the ordinary proceeding by which property was taken during the war.

Mr. GREGG. My understanding of that is, if the gentleman will pardon me, that there was a time when these conditional pardons were granted, but afterwards there was a general pardon granted to everyone without condition.

Mr. HOUSTON. The exemption is as set out in this fourth clause:

That the said N. F. Cheairs shall not by virtue of this warrant claim any property or the proceeds of any property that has been sold by order, judgment, or decree of any court under the confiscation laws of the United States.

That is the only condition that is made, and the fact is stated in the findings of the court that none of his property had been sold by order of the court.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. But the gentleman admits that it was taken in such a way that those who took it were acting under the laws of the country.

Mr. HOUSTON. Certainly; but——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It was taken in accordance with law. It was legally taken under the law which controlled the action of the agents of the Government at that time.

Mr. HOUSTON. This was not for the purpose of allowing him to recover property to which he had lost title—for instance, property which he might have sold to somebody else or against which some judgment had been rendered. That is the case provided for in the oath, and it only applies to property sold under order of a court.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. As the gentleman who has the floor [Mr. GREGG] says this pardon was issued some time after the close of the war, so the entire proceeding respecting the taking of this property and the sale of it must have taken place long before the pardon was issued.

Mr. GREGG. It was.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. So the matter of the time of issuing the pardon would cut no figure whatever as to the rights of this claimant.

Mr. GREGG. If I understand the point made by the gentleman, it is that the property was taken prior to the issuance of the pardon. Now, the Supreme Court, in passing upon that, say:

The restoration of the proceeds became the absolute right of the person pardoned. It was, in fact, promised for an equivalent. Pardon and restoration of political rights were in return for the oath and its fulfillment. To refuse it would be a breach of faith no less cruel and astonishing than to abandon the free people whom the Executive has promised to maintain in their freedom.

One of the decisions uses this language:

We have decided that the pardon closes the eyes of the courts to the offending acts, or, perhaps, more properly, furnishes conclusive evidence that they never existed as against the Government.

It restores him as though he had never committed any act of disloyalty.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. I will.

Mr. DAVIS. I am not familiar with the law of 1863, which seems to be the basis and foundation in this whole proceeding. I would like to inquire of the gentleman if that law, after setting out the method of procedure in taking this property and selling it and placing the proceeds in the Treasury, continued further to say what should become of the proceeds after they were gathered into the Treasury?

Mr. GREGG. I will read the act authorizing the collection by the Secretary of the Treasury of all abandoned and captured property.

That act authorized the collection by the Secretary of the Treasury of all abandoned or captured property in the insurrectionary States except materials of war, and directed that this should be sold and the proceeds placed in the Treasury. It gave a right to any person whose property was taken under its provisions to present a claim to the Court of Claims for the return of the proceeds of that property in the Treasury.

It also contained a clause that he should prove ownership and that he had been loyal. When that came up before the Supreme Court the court said that the pardon restored his loyalty, and if the property had been sold and the proceeds put in the Treasury it was his.

Mr. DAVIS. But the law did not state what should become of the proceeds—there was no direct statement in the law as to what should become of the proceeds.

Mr. GREGG. No.

Mr. HOUSTON. Here is a statement by the Supreme Court. The court says that the Government constituted itself a trustee for those who were entitled or whom it should thereafter recognize as entitled to the proceeds.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREGG. Certainly.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Reading the report of the committee in relation to this case, I do not find any date as to when the cotton belonging to this man was taken. It may have been long before the passage of the act. Certainly if the cotton was taken before that act was passed the act could not apply to the seizure of that cotton. I do not know whether the cotton was seized under such circumstances as to make this act apply to it. The report of the committee does not give us any information. We do not know when the cotton was taken; we do not know whether the law they read applies to the case; and we do not know whether the decisions of the court apply to a case of this kind. It is evident from all that has been said and all that has been read that this cotton was seized in pursuance of law, was sold in pursuance of law, but we have not been told that the decisions and laws that have been read apply to it in any respect whatever.

Mr. GREGG. If the gentleman will excuse me, it does apply to it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. When was the cotton seized?

Mr. GREGG. After 1863.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. There is no date given in the report.

Mr. GREGG. There is the report of the Court of Claims, if the gentleman will read it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I have read what the committee sets out in its report.

Mr. HOUSTON. The report sets out the claim. The cotton was taken about the 4th of January, 1864, and the court sustains the finding. There is no question about the date in the finding.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. What was the date of the passage of the act?

Mr. HOUSTON. In 1863.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The cotton was seized pursuant to that act.

Mr. GREGG. The Court of Claims finds that it was.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I yield.

Mr. GOOD. I simply rose to ask a question of the chairman of the committee. I notice at the top of page 2 of the report there is this statement, that in the case of Padelford against the United States the Supreme Court decided that that fund was a trust fund, and the effect of a pardon in compliance with its terms rendered the offender as innocent as if he had never committed the offense. The question I want to ask is whether or not in this case the terms of the pardon were identical with the terms of the pardon in the Padelford case, and did the pardon in the Padelford case contain the same or a similar provision set out in clause 4 in the case wherein the recipient of the pardon waived any claim he might have against the Government?

Mr. GREGG. No general pardon required a waiver of claim against the Government. Only conditional pardon required the waiver of claim where the property had been legally sold under order of the court.

Mr. GOOD. Was this a special pardon?

Mr. GREGG. Yes; and after the general pardon.

Mr. GOOD. In all cases mentioned in the report there was no especial pardon and no provision in the pardon that the man should waive whatever claim he might have?

Mr. GREGG. There is nothing to show what the terms of the pardon were; at least I have nothing.

Mr. GOOD. It seems to me that if the committee bases its claim on the decision of the Supreme Court the terms of the pardon in both cases ought to be somewhat similar. I would like to know what the facts are.

Mr. GREGG. I will answer the gentleman by asking him whether, if it was after the general pardon, it does not come under the conditions of the different decisions that I have alluded to.

Mr. GOOD. I can see quite a difference. If in this case where there was a general pardon containing the provisions that the person pardoned should waive any claim he might have against the Government, that would be entirely different from any case where the pardon that did not require that waiver.

Mr. GREGG. The gentleman has the Padelford case here and he may find it.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I can not conceive how any man who understands the facts of this case and the law would vote against this claimant Mr. Cheairs receiving pay for his cotton.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Certainly.

Mr. REILLY of Wisconsin. I would like to have the gentleman explain how it is that after 50 years this matter is still before Congress, if there is such a clear case of law and fact as is claimed?

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I will explain that. In 1861 there was a war between the South and the North. That war lasted until 1865, when down here at Appomattox the South laid down its arms. The North was a brother, and a part of the South. This Union remained intact. The Southern States came back into the Union. During that war millions of dollars' worth of property, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, was taken away from the people of the South. This Confederate soldier had back yonder on his plantation great droves of slaves that were as much his property under the law as his own money. He claims nothing for his slaves, and has never made any claim, but that same farmer had 50 bales of cotton lying back yonder and while that war was going on, on the 12th day of January, 1864, under an act passed by the Federal Government, that cotton was seized and sold. Deducting all of the expenses, the proceeds were placed over yonder in the Federal Treasury. That man, after the war, was pardoned for his offense against this Union when he took up arms for his native South and went out and fought for his fireside.

The Federal Government, through the greatest court in the world, said that this gentleman was entitled to be paid for his cotton, because of the fact that the President of the Federal Union had pardoned him for his disloyalty. On top of that we have the Court of Claims connected with this Government, that had passed on this identical claim, and all the facts, which says that this Confederate soldier, Mr. Cheairs, is entitled to the sum of $12,318.47, as the payment for his cotton, the net proceeds less the expense of selling it and transporting it to market, said net proceeds lying over here in the Federal Treasury of this Nation at this time. If this were in a court of equity, is there a chancellor in the United States that would say that this gentleman is not entitled to his pay? All civilized countries, even in the Orient, pay for the property that they confiscate during war. Is it possible that here in this Christian Republic, in the United States, where our Constitution has in it that we are entitled to liberty, freedom, and right, a Government will deprive its citizens of property, sell it, and then decline to pay the citizen for the actual net proceeds that the Government has to-day, holding without interest for 50 years? Is it possible that because this wrong has been perpetrating for 50 years, in this age of enlightenment, when it is presumed that we have no feeling against any section of the country, that we can not correct and right that wrong now? Is it possible that in this great Republic such a thing can be, when the tax is being borne by all of the people? Bear in mind that this Confederate soldier pays his taxes the same as any other citizen of this country, and he has the same right and is in duty bound by the same obligation as any other citizen to defend his country. This same man stood, after he was pardoned by the President of this Republic, in the same light as any Federal soldier stood. Is it honest and fair to say that because that man marched out under a banner and fought for his section of the country, and was then pardoned by the successful Army, by the Union itself, that he shall be deprived of his property, and for what? Who shall have that property? Can you take it and give it to John Smith or anyone else? It is yonder, according to the Court of Claims, in the Treasury, the property of Mr. Cheairs, and it is just as much his as any horse that he might have in his possession to-day.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Will the gentleman explain why that condition contained in the soldier's pardon does not bar him now from making this claim?

Mr. QUIN. It does not bar him because the highest court in the land has decided in his favor, and the Court of Claims, a coordinate court of this Government, has decided that the Government owes this much to him, and a committee of Congress has brought in a report upon that verdict of the Court of Claims, a judgment, and has asked this body, the representatives of the people, to vote him his money. The judges of our country are presumed to be honest men. The Court of Claims is composed of men of discernment and honor. They passed on this man's case It is simply now a perfunctory matter of Congress to appropriate the money to pay the judgment of the Court of Claims; and now shall this honorable body say that this claimant, this Confederate soldier, being deprived of his money for 50 long years, shall go down in his grave with the Federal Government, the flag that floats over him, owing him that debt? Can we, as the representatives of the people, defend our position in denying the judgment of a court? Can we, as representatives of the people, say that the Federal Government shall not pay the judgment of the courts of this country? Can we possibly be that partisan? I want to say that I am a Democrat, and that I am from the far Southland. I have the honor to represent the district in which Jefferson Davis, the President of the Confederacy, was reared. In my district he trotted around as a barefooted boy. He went to school down yonder in Wilkinson County; but I want to say that the people of my State, Mississippi, are as loyal to this Union as any man from Illinois is. We love our country. There is not a single State in this Union that will give a better pro rata of troops to go out and fight for this country to-day than the State of Mississippi. We had more than 10,000 men volunteer for services when we thought there was going to be a war with Mexico this year. When the Spanish War was on, Mississippi sent its quota, and my old law partner, who was a major in the Confederate army, went out in that war as a colonel of the First Mississippi Regiment.

Our people are loyal to this flag, and why should they be held down and deprived even of the verdict of a court by the Congress upon a partisan idea? I would vote for an honest claim in Maine, in Illinois, in New Hampshire, in Vermont, in Massachusetts, or anywhere else. The question of partisan feeling should not enter into our vote. The question that should come to the mind of every man when he goes to cast his vote on these bills should be, Is it honest, is it right, and is it just? Why should we say what part of the Union this ought to come from? Does it come from my district, does it come from my State? If I had to cast my vote here upon that kind of an idea I would resign my seat in Congress. If I had to cast my vote here as a partisan to deprive any citizen of this Union out of his rights, I would retire in humiliation before I would stand here as a pretended representative of the people. The people of America are honest people; they are just; they do not want a wrong done to any people. They do not ask Congress to do an injustice to any man in this Republic.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I will.

Mr. NORTON. Does the gentleman think it is unjust for the Government to show a disapproval of disloyalty, or does the gentleman think it is the proper thing to put a prize upon loyalty.

Mr. QUIN. I do not know what the gentleman means by the question, but upon the question of disloyalty I want to say that in our country, bound together in States, there was a question, sir, whether or not they had the right to secede. That question was fought out. It was won by the force of arms; not by the force of law, not by the force of right, but by the force of might. Then those States that had seceded from the Union came back into this Union, and through the organized power of this Union those people who were fighting against the flag were pardoned for their offense, and they are to-day and since they accepted the conditions of the Government under the pardon have been as loyal to this Republic's flag as any other citizen of any State that remained in the Union. And it is not a question of whether or not we are approving or disapproving of disloyalty. It is a question of paying an honest debt. All civilized nations, as I have said, have paid for the property that they have taken from a country when they invaded it, and why should the United States Government decline to pay for the property that it took, not for the purpose of destruction, but which it took and sold and the proceeds were put into the Treasury?

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. QUIN. I will.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman has made the statement several times that all civilized nations to-day compensated the enemy for property taken. That statement has been made by other gentlemen on this floor. I do not believe that that is the fact, that civilized nations at war to-day pay the enemy for property used by them in time of warfare against a nation, and this cotton in this case was certainly one of the best properties the South had to maintain its cause against the North. The gentleman is arguing from a premise that is entirely wrong when he states that all civilized nations to-day in warfare pay the enemy for property taken.

Mr. QUIN. I have great respect for the judgment and learning of my friend, but I want to say that the gentleman ought to go and read up on that proposition. If he can state in this House a single country on the face of this globe, except the United States, that has failed to pay for the property it confiscated and sold, then he is entitled to a chromo. This Government itself, when we invaded Mexico—and if the gentleman will investigate the records, he will see it is true—paid for the property we took in Mexico.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. Has the German Empire paid one dollar to a single Frenchman for the property they took, used, or destroyed on their trip from the border to the capital of France in 1870 and 1871?

Mr. QUIN. I give the gentleman as my authority the Hon. THOMAS U. SISSON, of Mississippi, who says that is the case, and I believe he knows what he is talking about. I want to say, my friends, in connection with this case we have before us now, it is one part of this Union taking private property of citizens of another part of it, not for war purposes, but they simply sold it. We all know that cotton is one of the best products of the world; that 50 bales of cotton would be good to-day if it had been left lying under the gin or under a shed down yonder in the State of Tennessee; but we find that the Government itself, under act of law, sold this man's cotton. It is a question of honesty and right for the Government to pay him. He is asking for no interest, he knows he could not get it, but the proceeds of the sale of this cotton to-day have been lying in the Treasury since January 12, 1864. He is entitled to it, and how any man could vote against Mr. Cheairs receiving that money I can not understand. The property was taken away from the man simply because he belonged to one of the contending armies of this country; it was sold; and to say that he should not receive pay for it is beyond comprehension, and that in the face of the Supreme Court of this Republic, that in the face of this very identical case of a judgment by the Court of Claims, and still men can rise up on this floor and say he should not be paid.

So far as the South is concerned, the war is a thing of the past. That part of this Union is able to stand for itself now. It is always going to do the clean and right thing, and why should any other section of this country want to perpetuate a wrong against any man who comes from that section I can not conceive. Why should this Government, through its Congress, decline to pay a judgment of the Court of Claims to Mr. Cheairs simply because he was a citizen of the South who went out to fight for his flag. I ask you, gentlemen, in the name of judgment and right, in the name of honesty and fair dealing, to lay aside partisanship and sectional feeling, and vote for this claim; and for all such claims for cotton or any other property from Mississippi or any other State.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. QUIN. I will.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman understand that the Court of Claims rendered judgment in this matter?

Mr. QUIN. Yes, sir. It is equivalent to a judgment. It was the finding of facts.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is very far off.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I want to get some information if I can get it, and I have no doubt I can, either from the chairman of the committee or the gentleman who has the bill in charge. Now, the report says this:

> None of the property of N. F. Cheairs was ever sold by the order, judgment, or decree of court under the confiscation laws of the United States.

I would like to know how that property was sold? Is there any record of it?

Mr. GREGG. It was sold under the captured and abandoned property act.

Mr. COX. What provision is made under the law for the sale of property taken under the abandoned and captured property act?

Mr. GREGG. I do not know all the details.

Mr. COX. Does the act set it down?

Mr. GREGG. The people abandoned the property. To keep that property and keep it from being stolen, Congress passed the act of 1863 which provided the Secretary of the Treasury should seize all of that property and sell it. There was no judgment of court or anything. He sold it, and the proceeds were turned into the Treasury.

Mr. COX. What was the mode of procedure of the sale of this property? Was it advertised? Was there any judgment or decree rendered by any court at all?

Mr. GREGG. No; there was no decree of court. He just sold it on the market. Whether he advertised it or not I do not know. But he sold it on the market.

Mr. COX. Then, as an illustration, if the Government under this act got possession of 100 bales of cotton down in Texas that had been abandoned—and I am now addressing myself to the property taken under that act—then, as the gentleman understands, the Secretary of the Treasury would simply put that on the market and sell it——

Mr. GREGG. At the market price.

Mr. COX. As though the Government was a producer of cotton?

Mr. GREGG. Yes, sir; that is the way it was done, as I understand.

Mr. COX. I presume that accounts, then, for the reason why this clause is inserted under the proclamation of Andrew Johnson, as follows:

> That the said N. F. Cheairs shall not by virtue of this warrant claim any property or the proceeds of any property that has been sold by order, judgment, or decree of any court under the confiscation laws of the United States.

Mr. GREGG. This was not a confiscation law.

Mr. COX. I understand. If it had been a confiscation act, then Mr. Cheairs, or any person occupying a similar position to his, could possibly get the benefit of this act.

Mr. GREGG. He waived that when he accepted the pardon. It would have been sold under the confiscation act, but he waived that, and then it was sold.

Mr. SLOAN. I would like to ask if this was not taken as abandoned property? I understand it has been so stated.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not suppose anybody has made that statement. It was taken as captured property.

Mr. SLOAN. Not abandoned property?

Mr. HOUSTON. Oh, no. It was property belonging to Mr. Cheairs, left there in Tennessee, and the Federal Army came along and captured it and sold it under the laws as provided for by Congress.

Mr. SLOAN. It was seized as a military prize?

Mr. HOUSTON. I can not say about that. It was simply captured. The property was found there. The owner was away elsewhere, in the army, and they took charge of it, captured it, and sold it.

Mr. SLOAN. Why I ask the question is that the statute about which we are talking provides for taking abandoned property and also captured property.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLOAN. And I understand this was not taken from him as abandoned property?

Mr. HOUSTON. We have no way of knowing here just the details or facts concerning it, but I have no idea that this property was abandoned. It was on his premises there, and captured by the Federal authorities and sold.

Mr. SLOAN. Taken from him when and where found.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FOWLER. I did not understand that the owner of the property lived in Mississippi at the time the property was taken. Is that true?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not advised as to where his residence was.

Mr. FOWLER. I caught that from the speeches made on the floor, and I was asking for information.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no knowledge that he was in Mississippi. In fact, I understand he was a resident of Tennessee.

Mr. FOWLER. Was the cotton grown in Tennessee?

Mr. HOUSTON. The cotton was grown, as I understand it, in Murray County, Tenn., on the farm of the claimant.

Mr. FOWLER. Was the claimant's cotton a portion of that cotton which was taken in 1863, 1864, and 1865, and held in common and sold and the fund reserved by the Government?

Mr. HOUSTON. It was cotton that was seized in 1864 under the captured-property act by the Federal Army. It was seized by the officers and sold in 1864 and the proceeds turned into the Treasury.

Mr. FOWLER. There is a case reported in the Ninety-second United States Reports regarding certain cotton that was captured during those three years that I have referred to, and after a portion of it was used for breastworks and things of that kind it was collected and held in common and sold, and the proceeds, as I understand from the reading of the decision, were probably held for the purpose of remunerating the owners after the Court of Claims had passed upon it.

The case went up to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court affirmed that the findings of the lower court or the Court of Claims were correct. Now I am seeking information as to whether this particular case was on all fours with the case reported in the Sixty-second United States Reports, page 652.

Mr. HOUSTON. What is the name of that case?

Mr. FOWLER. It is the interningled-cotton case.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not able to answer that question. I am not familiar with the facts in that case at all.

Mr. FOWLER. It is the case of the United States against Raymond, assignee, and several others. If your case comes under the same circumstances as the case reported in this Supreme Court report, I would be very glad to know it. I am not familiar with the circumstances of the case except as stated in the report of the committee; but if you are familiar with this case in the Supreme Court—Ninety-second Supreme Court Reports—I would be very glad if you will tell me if your case is on all fours with this.

Mr. HOUSTON. I stated to the gentleman that I am not acquainted with the facts in that case. This case is reported by my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT]; and as to the facts of this case, I regret that I can not give you information.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] if he knows whether or not any other property had been seized by the Government of the United States belonging to this claimant?

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no knowledge as to that.

Mr. SLOAN. The reason I ask this question is this: This pardon, issued by President Johnson, was virtually issued in pursuance of the act of July 2, 1862, which provides—

> That the President is hereby authorized, at any time hereafter, by proclamation, to extend to persons who may have participated in the existing rebellion in any State or part thereof, pardon and amnesty, with such exceptions and for such time and on such conditions as he may deem expedient for the public welfare.

I note here in the report which is filed that there is a rather interesting condition attached to the granting of the pardon and in the form followed in the acceptance of the pardon. I assume that all that is insisted upon here is good faith; and if it is a fact that this is the only claim that Mr. Chcairs or his agents or assigns had against the Government, then he must have referred in this pardon to this particular claim; and if he did, absolute good faith would bind him and his heirs and executors, who stand in his stead, not to press this claim. Hence I think it is a matter for consideration and investigation as to whether or not this man Chcairs ever had any other claim.

Mr. HOUSTON. What is the clause there?

Mr. SLOAN. It is the fourth, which has been liberally discussed here. I assume and would assume that if there was no other claim, that was the claim that Chcairs had in mind when that pardon was written and when he accepted it.

Mr. MANN. Mr Chairman, I desire to address the committee a little further in answer to some of the propositions which have been made. When I addressed the committee before I had a very good audience. For some reason gentlemen have left. I desire to have somebody to talk to, and I therefore make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-nine gentlemen are present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BARNHART, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee, having under consideration bills on the Private Calendar, found itself without a quorum; whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 205 Members, a quorum, responded to their names, and he reported the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it possible to get my name stricken from that list of absentees?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BRYAN. Well, I am here, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. That does not make any difference now, because the gentleman was not here in time. [Laughter.]

The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House, with Mr. BARNHART in the chair, for the further consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has 40 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG] misapprehended the purport of the argument which I made in opening the debate. The captured and abandoned cotton claims are one thing. In the law providing for the capture of cotton there was a method also provided for making a claim for the money realized for the sale of the cotton. My recollection is that the claimants have to prove loyalty. Now, the question here involved is whether the special or general pardon given to those who participated in the Confederate Army gives them the same status as loyal citizens for the recovery for the value of property taken away from them. That is practically the only question involved. That is the whole purport of the report of the committee in the case—that the claimant here, who was in the Confederate Army, has had that fact removed in contemplation of law by the pardon which was extended to him by President Johnson. But the pardon extended to him by President Johnson is no broader, and in fact not so broad as the pardon which has since been extended by the Government to all of those who participated in the Confederate Army; and if the claimant in this case can make his claim properly because his disloyalty has been set aside by reason of the pardon, then any citizen of the South who participated in the Confederate Army is no longer barred from making a claim by reason of disloyalty. When I use the term "disloyalty" I use it in the legal sense. So far as I am concerned I have no criticism against those who participated on the southern side of the war. The time for feeling on that subject has long since passed by. My father was in the Union Army. He came from Kentucky. I had numerous relatives in the Confederate Army. They were divided, family against family, in Kentucky. All of the bitterness of the war has passed away as far as I am concerned, but I do not see any reason which permits the gentlemen from the South, like my friend from Mississippi, to say "Oh, we are all brothers again. We have forgiven on both sides, but open your pocketbook and let me take what I want."

The forgiveness goes, but that is no reason for emptying the Federal Treasury. If we had to buy the friendly feeling of the southerner, it would not be worth having. So far as the results of the war are concerned, in the conduct of the armies in the field, the matter must be tested by the ordinary rules of warfare and the results of war, not by the desire to be friends now. The spirit of friendship does not require us to pay the claims which are not based upon justice, according to the rules of warfare.

My friend from Texas [Mr. GREGG] said he was not in favor of paying for any property destroyed by the Union Army in the Confederate States, and he laid down a wrong rule of law as to the liability of an army in an enemy's country. I do not know that I am authorized to have or express in any way an expert opinion on that subject, but I think that ordinarily when an army in an enemy's country takes property from noncombatants for the use of the army it pays for it, though not always, but it is under no legal obligation to those who are on the other side to pay for property taken from them. This case is one where the Union Army seized property belonging to a man in the Confederate Army. It seized it as an act of war. It had no other right to seize it, and in the legislation which authorized the seizure the United States did not provide that this claimant could ever recover the value of the property. But my friend from Texas [Mr. GREGG], chairman of the great Committee on War Claims, when he says that he and his committee are not in favor of payment of anything for the destruction of property, is slightly in error, because upon this calendar, waiting to be reached this afternoon, is a resolution to have the Court of Claims make a finding upon a claim for $33,450, on account of property belonging to one Joshua Nichols, captured and destroyed by the United States soldiers.

Mr. GREGG. Will the gentleman excuse me for just a moment?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GREGG. It is my purpose when that bill is reached to ask that it be laid on the table. I have it marked for that purpose—to be laid on the table.

Mr. MANN. I am glad that the argument which I have made on this subject has had some effect.

Mr. GREGG. The gentleman's argument did not have any effect. I was of that opinion before.

Mr. MANN. I notice that the resolution was reported from the Committee on War Claims, and there was no indication made to this effect until I discussed the matter some time ago; and now I would like to know what is going to be done with this case: On the same calendar, to be reached this afternoon, is another resolution to refer to the Court of Claims a claim of the trustees of Davenport Female College for injuries done the buildings and destroying the property of said institution by the Federal soldiers at the close of the late Civil War. That was an act of war.

There were recently reported from the Committee on War Claims some 20, 30, 40, or 50—I do not remember the number—of similar bills, which came up in such a manner that the only way to pass an omnibus resolution was to eliminate those claims, and I insisted that they should be eliminated. The resolution was then passed.

Mr. GREGG. Will the gentleman excuse me for just a moment?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GREGG. Where is that Davenport College case? I do not see it on the calendar.

Mr. MANN. All right; I will help the gentleman out. It is Private Calendar No. 237, House resolution 524, reported May 23, 1914.

Mr. GREGG. It is not a resolution to pay, but it is to refer the claim to the Court of Claims. It is not a bill to pay that amount.

Mr. MANN. Did I say that it was?

Mr. GREGG. Anyone who was not paying strict attention might infer that that was what the gentleman meant.

Mr. MANN. Everybody else in the House, except the gentleman from Texas, was paying strict attention.

Mr. GREGG. If the gentleman is correct, there is nothing in his argument.

Mr. MANN. That is about as near as my friend from Texas comes in an argument.

Mr. GREGG. I said that our committee was not in favor of paying for property destroyed, and in answer the gentleman from Illinois said that there was a bill on the calendar already providing for the payment; but it is not so. It only provides for referring the claim to the Court of Claims and let them decide whether or not there is any obligation on the part of the Government to pay it. The gentleman may object to the claimant having his day in court; that is about in line with the argument that the gentleman usually makes on this character of a bill. If a man has a claim that he thinks ought to be paid, I think he should be permitted to go into court and let the court say whether or not it is a just claim. Therein I differ with the gentleman from Illinois. I think the claimant ought to have a right to go into a court and let the court say whether or not it is a just claim.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have been extremely courteous to the gentleman from Texas and allowed him to interject all this stuff into my speech. I stated in the beginning that the resolution on the calendar was to refer to the Court of Claims the claim in that case.

Mr. GREGG. Did not the gentleman ask what was going to be done with it?

Mr. MANN. I did not ask what was going to be done with it. If the gentleman will not listen or willfully will not understand me I can not help it. I use the English language as carefully as I know how, more carefully, I think, than does the gentleman from Texas. When I make a statement the gentleman need not be alarmed but that it will be a correct statement. The mere fact that he does not listen to what I say will not affect the correctness of the statement which I make.

There is no reason for referring to the Court of Claims a claim which, on its face, ought not to be paid. If we should not pay for the destruction of property by the Union Army, then we ought not to refer to the Court of Claims a claim for the destruction of property. Is not that perfectly patent to anyone?

The fact is I asked the gentleman from Mississippi a while ago if he thought the Court of Claims had rendered a judgment in this case, and he said, "Well, equivalent to a judgment," or something of that kind. The Court of Claims in this class of cases renders no judgment or anything equivalent to a judgment. The committee here reported, and I believe it is still on the calendar, a bill to pay a man where the Court of Claims had rendered a finding, and the finding was that there was no legal or equitable claim on his behalf against the Government; having reported it, I suppose, on the theory that we should carry out a finding of the Court of Claims because, forsooth, the Court of Claims has found the amount involved. Therefore, they find in this case the amount involved, but the Court of Claims has not recommended the payment.

I would be willing, as far as I am concerned, to pass a law, under proper guaranty, permitting the Court of Claims to enter a judgment in any case where it thought it was proper to enter a judgment. But we now go through the farce very often of having bills to pay findings of the Court of Claims, and my friend from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] talked at some length, and so that we could hear him, about this matter having been before the Court of Claims and the Court of Claims having disposed of it. The Court of Claims makes a finding. They do not find that the man was loyal; they find that he was disloyal.

Now, what is the law in reference to these findings of the Court of Claims? It is almost impossible for the average Member of Congress, with the multitudinous duties which fall to him, to understand what is meant by reference to the Court of Claims or by findings of the Court of Claims.

The Court of Claims was created a good many years ago. Some time ago Congress found that there were so many of these private bills introduced and referred to committees of the House and the Senate where questions of fact were presented only from the claimant's side of the case that the committee could not very well dispose of them. Congress decided that any committee of the House might refer a private bill to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts. Any committee of the House which has a private bill before it, except a pension bill, can refer it to the Court of Claims for finding of facts. But the power of the Court of Claims is not quite as good toward the claimant if referred by a committee as it is if referred by the House or the Senate. Usually, therefore, claimants want these bills referred either by the House or by the Senate.

We carried this into the Judicial Code, section 151, which provides:

Whenever any bill, except for a pension, is pending in either House of Congress providing for the payment of a claim against the United States, legal or equitable, or for a grant, gift, or bounty to any person, the House in which such bill is pending may, for the investigation and determination of facts, refer the same to the Court of Claims, which shall proceed with the same in accordance with such rules as it may adopt, and report to such House the facts in the case and the amount, where the same can be liquidated, including any facts bearing upon the question whether there has been delay or laches in presenting such claim or applying for such grant, gift, or bounty, and any facts bearing upon the question whether the bar of any statute of limitation should be removed or which shall be claimed to excuse the claimant for not having resorted to any established legal remedy, together with such conclusions as shall be sufficient to inform Congress of the nature and character of the demand, either as a claim, legal or equitable, or as a gratuity against the United States, and the amount, if any, legally or equitably due from the United States to the claimant.

With the proviso that if the man establishes a claim upon which the Court of Claims is entitled to render judgment, the court may proceed to render judgment. But if the court renders judgment, the case never comes back to the Committee on Claims. Every judgment rendered against the United States is paid as a matter of course, without question, without debate, without controversy, in the deficiency appropriation bill.

Section 159 of this same law provides:

The claimant shall in all cases fully set forth in his petition the claim, the action thereon in Congress, or by any of the departments, if such action has been had, what persons are owners thereof or interested therein, when and upon what consideration such persons became so interested; that no assignment or transfer of said claim or of any part thereof or interest therein has been made except as stated in the petition; that said claimant is justly entitled to the amount therein claimed from the United States after allowing all just credits and offsets; that the claimant, and, where the claim has been assigned, the original and every prior owner thereof, if a citizen, has at all times borne true allegiance to the Government of the United States, and whether a citizen or not has not in any way voluntarily aided, abetted, or given encouragement to rebellion against the said Government, and that he believes the facts as stated in the said petition to be true—

And so forth. Section 160 provides that the Government may traverse the allegation of loyalty.

Section 161 provides:

Whenever it is material in any claim to ascertain whether any person did or did not give any aid or comfort to forces or government of the late Confederate States during the Civil War, the claimant asserting the loyalty of any such person to the United States during such Civil War shall be required to prove affirmatively that such person did, during said Civil War, consistently adhere to the United States and did give no aid or comfort to persons engaged in said Confederate service in said Civil War.

Mr. Chairman, of course we are not bound by that provision. We have the power to pay any claim that we please, but if we refer it to the Court of Claims under the existing law, the claimant is required to prove loyalty. It is now proposed to have Congress say that the man who was disloyal has the disloyalty wiped out if he has a pardon, and everyone has a pardon. The proposition involved in this bill is: You will have to prove loyalty, and in order to prove loyalty you must prove that you were in the Confederate Army and that there has been a general pardon granted since then, and that will constitute proof that you were never disloyal. They say that because they claim that the pardon wipes out the offense. No one can be disloyal. What a farce it would be! This legislation that I have just read to you, while it has been carried on the statute books for a number of years, was enacted in its present form only in 1911, long after a pardon had been granted to everyone who served in the Confederate Army. Does Congress mean nothing by these provisions? Is it the intention to say that because a pardon has been granted, therefore we not only will not punish but we will credit you with everything that you lost and pay it back to you out of the National Treasury?

The pardon was granted for the purpose of doing away with the disabilities in respect to citizenship and removing the prosecutions for disloyalty. The pardon was not granted for the purpose of making a claim against the National Government for property which the disloyal claimant owned and lost on account of the war. We do not refer to our southern brothers any longer as disloyal. There is no feeling about that, but I do not think that they ought to use the plea that we are brothers again in the Union, pardoned, in order to extract money from the Treasury. Of course the committee in reporting a bill like this does not intend to have it spread wide and far, but the claim agents who are behind these bills get up one that is as good as they can find for the purpose of setting a precedent, and Congress can not say to John Jones that it will pay him and to Jim Smith that it will not under the same circumstances pay him.

When one of the bills of this character passes, it establishes a precedent. We passed in this House, during this Congress, an omnibus claims bill carrying a thousand or two thousand claims, I do not remember the number, without controversy, without debate. Many of them upon the particular facts in the case were objectionable, but we have set a precedent which we thought had covered every item in that bill by previous action of the House. Gentlemen know that while I make no claims to being a good fighter, there are times occasionally when I fight one of these claims; but when Congress has established its position by making a precedent, I accept that as the conclusion of Congress. There are many claims in the omnibus war claims bill that I would not have permitted to pass by unanimous consent, if they were original propositions. Many of them I considered vicious and wrong, but where Congress has acted upon these claims I do not feel disposed, and nobody else does, to pay one man his claim because his Member of Congress is active or popular and then not pay the other man his claim because, forsooth, he may not be on speaking terms with his Member of Congress. Government must deal justly by all. Government is not a matter of favoritism, and ought not to be. Therefore I am opposed to making the precedent of paying claims upon the theory that either a special or a general pardon wipes out the needed proof of loyalty. If the claims amounted to only a small number, we might waive that and pay them, as we do sometimes with other claims, but the destruction of property, the taking of property, ran into the hundreds of millions of dollars. We can not justify ourselves, and neither can a succeeding Congress, in the payment of one claim, where the man was disloyal and has been pardoned, and not pay the rest of the claims under similar conditions.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COX. For information, if I can make myself plain, under what is known as the captured and abandoned property act, has the Court of Claims power to render judgment, or under that act is it wholly confined to a finding of facts?

Mr. MANN. Under the captured and abandoned property act it has the power to render judgment.

Mr. COX. If it has the power to render judgment, did the law preclude the Court of Claims from rendering judgment in favor of one who had been disloyal to the Union?

Mr. MANN. Well, that is a matter of controversy, so much a matter of controversy I think it would. We have recently passed a law in the House to remove that claim as to property captured and abandoned after June 1, 1865.

Mr. COX. That is what is known as the Moon Act?

Mr. MANN. No; that is the Watkins bill. The statute in reference to captured and abandoned property is:

SEC. 162. The Court of Clams shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the claims of those whose property was taken subsequent to June 1, 1865, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 12, 1863, entitled "An act to provide for the collection of abandoned property and for the prevention of frauds in insurrectionary districts within the United States," and acts amendatory thereof where the property so taken was sold and the net proceeds thereof were placed in the Treasury of the United States; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall return said net proceeds to the owners thereof, on the judgment of said court, and full jurisdiction is given to said court to adjudge said claims, any statutes of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding.

That does not apply in this case——

Mr. GREGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. In just a minute—because this property was captured before June 1, 1865.

Mr. GREGG. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman what he read from at that moment, from the Judicial Code?

Mr. MANN. From section 162 of the judicial title. In the law, even in the general bill we passed some time ago gentlemen did not make it go back of June 1, 1865. In the argument we had on that bill—and I opposed its passage—the claim was made that the war was practically though not officially over June 1, 1865, and hence any property taken after that date the Government ought to pay for, if it had sold the property and put the proceeds in the Treasury, and that it was not the intention to make that claim to property captured while the war was going on; but this one is not only to pay for property captured and sold while the war was in its most active operation, but it is an act to pay a man who was in the Confederate Army at the time the property was captured and sold.

Mr. COX. Let me see if I understand the gentleman. Does the gentleman say that the Watkins Act, passed by Congress some time ago——

Mr. MANN. The Watkins bill passed the House; it has not yet passed the Senate.

Mr. COX. What the House was endeavoring to do under the Watkins bill was only to make it apply to property taken after June 1, 1865.

Mr. MANN. It was to remove the disloyalty proposition on property taken after June 1, 1865.

Mr. COX. And this proposes to pay for property taken while the war was in progress?

Mr. MANN. It is to pay for property captured in 1864 at the very height of the war. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to the point made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] in regard to the effect of this fourth clause of the pardon issued by President Johnson. The gentleman seems to entertain the idea that by this fourth clause the claimant in this case is estopped from claiming the money that was realized from the sale of these 50 bales of cotton. Now, if you will examine the clause, you will see that it says:

Fourth. That the said N. F. Cheairs shall not by virtue of this warrant claim any property or the proceeds of any property that has been sold by order, judgment, or decree of any court under the confiscation laws of the United States.

That is limited absolutely and alone to a judgment for property sold by an order or judgment of the court under the confiscation laws. There is no such thing as that in this case. The finding of the Court of Claims sets forth the fact that none of his property was sold under any such order of the court as that. Therefore that can not have any bearing on the case other than to show that the gentleman stands in court with all the rights that he had from the beginning because of the fact that by act of Congress the Government is made the trustee of the individual whose property was taken and sold under this captured and abandoned property act. It is insisted that this was for the benefit of loyal persons. Granted that is true and that loyalty must be established in order to realize and receive the benefits of that, yet we come upon this footing, that the claimant in this case stands before this Government to-day, stands before the public officials who held this money in trust for him, just in the attitude of a man who had been absolutely loyal to the Government from the beginning of his career practically until to-day. Congress saw proper in 1862 to authorize the President of the United States to grant a pardon upon certain conditions to certain persons, and the terms on which those pardons were to be granted were to be kept in good faith. The pardon was intended to accomplish a wise and salutary purpose; that is, that the President of the United States in the exercise of this beneficent power of pardon might reclaim citizens who had wandered into the fields of disloyalty; that by offering a pardon to them they should ground their arms of rebellion, so to speak, and come back into the Union, come back and accept the conditions that are offered by the terms of the pardon and become loyal and true citizens of the United States. Now, I say Congress did that, and it did it in good faith, and it expected when the President of the United States exercised that power he was acting in good faith with the people over whom he was exercising it.

It was not expected he would grant a pardon upon clear and specific terms and then that this Government should refuse to obey the terms of that pardon. That would be a breach of faith that would be disgraceful to this Government. It would be disgraceful to any Government to take advantage of a condition and thus break its own plighted words and the terms of its own plighted pardon.

Now, we have the language of the Supreme Court to show that by the act of the President of the United States this claimant was relieved of the disability of disloyalty. The terms of that pardon are full and specific, and for that very reason they mentioned the clause that is alluded to in the fourth section of the pardon, saying that this shall not apply to claims for which judgments have been rendered by a court in pursuance of the confiscation law. But the court goes on to say, further, this:

The act of March 12, 1863 (12 Stat. L., 820), to provide for the collection of abandoned and captured property in insurrectionary districts within the United States does not confiscate or in any case absolutely divest the property of the original owner, even though disloyal. By the seizure the Government constituted itself a trustee for those who were entitled or whom it should thereafter recognize as entitled.

Further:

By virtue of the act of 17th July, 1862, authorizing the President to offer pardon on such conditions as he might think advisable, and the proclamation of 8th December, 1863, which promised a restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, on condition that the prescribed oath be taken and kept inviolate, the persons who had faithfully accepted the conditions offered became entitled to the proceeds of their property thus paid into the Treasury on application within two years from the close of the war.

Now, Mr. Chairman, just a little further. I want to call your attention to the language of the opinion of the court, as follows:

And it is reasonable to infer that it was the purpose of Congress that the proceeds of the property for which the special provision of the act was made should go into the Treasury without change of ownership. Certainly such was the intention in respect to the property of loyal men. That the same intention prevailed in regard to the property of owners who, though then hostile, might subsequently become loyal appears probable from the circumstance that no provision is anywhere made for confiscation of it—

And so on.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will.

Mr. NORTON. When, under the gentleman's theory, does the United States obtain title to property taken under the recapture act of March 12, 1863, belonging to men who were disloyal?

Mr. HOUSTON. Now, in this case I will say the act itself provided that these claims should be brought within two years.

Mr. NORTON. The claims of those who were disloyal?

Mr. HOUSTON. When the claim of loyalty should be set up, do you mean, or when the claim to the property should be set up?

Mr. NORTON. No. When does the United States obtain title to property taken under this act applying to disloyal parties?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am not prepared to answer that question.

Mr. NORTON. There is not any provision in the law, according to your theory, that the United States should ever obtain title.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, this money is in the Public Treasury of the United States. The property has been sold and the money is placed there, and as representatives and trustees of the people and of this Government it is our duty, if a man makes out a case that justly entitles him to money in the Treasury, to do what is right by the man and by the people, and return that money to him.

Gentlemen say a good deal about the kindly feeling they have toward the South, and they deprecate any idea of a reference to any unkindness toward a man from the South for disloyalty. The talk beautifully upon that subject. This feeling of harmony, good fellowship, and good will is ever on their lips; but when it comes to putting it into practice it seems they halt and hesitate and do not make good the professions they claim with so much eloquence and fairness.

Now, this is a case that rests upon its merits. They do not come and ask for sympathy or anything of that kind, but they come and present to you a case here that, under the strict terms of the law and under the strict terms of the rulings of the Supreme Court, as we construe them, and, as we think, fairly and correctly, says the man is entitled to his money. We believe he is entitled to it according to the solemn dictum of the Supreme Court of the United States. The money is in the Treasury. It was taken from him. He has brought himself within the rules laid down by the law. He has complied with the terms, and I think he is entitled to this money. So I hope this House will pass the bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just spoken says that the fourth clause of the pardon issued to this claimant does not apply to this case and does not preclude him from making his claim, because it says that he "shall make no claim for the proceeds of property that has been sold by the order, judgment, or decree of any court under the confiscation law." He says that the finding of the Court of Claims expressly says that this property was not taken or sold under the confiscation laws. I have a copy of the findings of the Court of Claims. It is Senate Document No. 148, Fifty-ninth Congress, second session, and it contains no such statement. The Court of Claims makes no finding on that point. It expresses no opinion on it and no opinion upon any other question, as far as the merits of this claim are concerned. It is a finding of fact by the court, and, as we all know, the Court of Claims can only make a finding of fact. It can not pass upon the merits. It can express no opinion as to whether or not a claimant is making a proper or meritorious claim. The finding is very brief. It simply says that "this man was in rebellion against the Government; that he was an officer in the rebel army; that he was taken prisoner at the surrender of Fort Donelson; was exchanged and is now within the rebel lines, and I am informed is now an agent of some kind for purchasing cattle for the use of the rebel army. Is reported to be again a prisoner."

It tells of the seizure of cotton belonging to this man and of its sale. It does not say under what proceedings, but evidently under proper proceedings recognized by law; that the law that controls such sales regulated the disposition to be made of the money arising from the sale.

In view of this finding by the Court of Claims I insist that this seizure and sale were as if made under the law providing for confiscation of the property. And I wish to call the attention of the committee to another matter, and that is, that this cotton was seized on January 4, 1864, as I remember the date, and a special pardon by the President was not issued until September, 1865, as I remember that date. It is not to be presumed that the President was not informed as to all the facts in this man's case. He was giving special consideration to this man's case. He found some special reasons for giving him a pardon, and a special pardon was issued to him.

And I repeat that it is not to be presumed that the President was not in possession of all the facts relating to this man's conduct, in relation to his property, and in relation to the seizure and sale of it, under the law regulating proceedings of that kind. Whatever other law was on the books relating to the confiscation of property and the disposition of it at that time, it does not appear from any record that this man was ever haled into court under that law, or that his property ever was seized under the law. But his property had been seized under some law. There had been a regular and orderly procedure by officers acting under the law. They had seized this property and sold it. The President knew of it, and on condition that the pardon should be issued, he stated, as set forth in the pardon, that this man should never make any claim against the Government for property sold under decree of court, under a confiscation law; practically saying that he should never make any claim against the Government on account of the property that theretofore had been taken from him and sold.

I insist, Mr. Chairman, that this fourth condition of the pardon does apply to him in this case, and it precludes him altogether from making a claim such as is made in this bill in his behalf.

This cotton was seized on the 4th of January, 1864. The finding of the Court of Claims says there was no claim of any kind made to this Government or to any of its officers by this man or on his behalf until the claimant appeared and filed his petition in the Court of Claims on May 20, 1904. Forty years after the cotton had been taken he appears or somebody else appears in his behalf. Very well might the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. REILLY] ask, "Why is it that after the lapse of 50 years this claim should now be brought to Congress in this way" when all the facts and circumstances relating to the case are so hazy and it is so difficult to get at the real status of the matter?

I want to call the attention of this committee to the fact that this claimant desires to be repaid for his cotton at the price of nearly 60 cents a pound—five times the price or value of cotton at the present time.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman excuse me for a moment if I interrupt him?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. In a minute. I will yield the floor altogether in a minute.

Mr. GREGG. Very well.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that this claim is altogether without merit. I indorse heartily what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says, that it is impossible that the Supreme Court, in its decision, passing on the matter of pardons and the effect of them, could have intended to nullify the provisions of all these laws, which provide that a claimant, in order to establish a claim and lay a foundation for a bill for his relief, shall show that he was loyal to the Union at the time his property was taken.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I say it is impossible that the Supreme Court should have intended any such construction.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG] asked me to yield first.

Mr. GREGG. The gentleman mentioned the fact that the claimant was asking for payment for his cotton at the rate of 60 cents a pound?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes; 60 cents a pound.

Mr. GREGG. The gentleman may not have noticed it, but what he is asking for is the amount that the Government got for it, after deducting all expenses, and that is the net amount that was paid into the Treasury.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. That does not at all change or influence the statement I made a moment ago, that claimant, or some one in his behalf—his heirs, or his children, or his grandchildren, or some one possibly who has no interest whatever in him—is asking pay for the cotton taken at the rate of 60 cents a pound.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. COX].

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG] asked the same question that I wanted to ask.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GREGG. I thought the gentleman had given up the floor.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BARNHART, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration bills on the Private Calendar, and particularly the bill (H. R. 8696) for the relief of Nathaniel F. Cheairs, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8696, and that the debate be limited to two minutes.

Mr. MANN. Those are two separate motions. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that a Member can not do that in one motion. I make the point of order that that motion as one motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Illinois is correct.

Mr. MANN. There is no doubt about that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GREGG] moves in the first instance that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8696, and, pending that, he moves that general debate be limited to two minutes.

Mr. MANN. I move to amend the last motion by making it two hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to amend the last motion by making it two hours. The question is on agreeing to the motion to amend.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded. Those in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Illinois will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Eighteen gentlemen have risen in the affirmative. Those opposed will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Twenty-three gentlemen have risen in the negative.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that there is no quorum present on this vote.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 18 and the noes are 23. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present on this vote.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not have to do that. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those who favor the motion to amend made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will, when their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 58, nays 153, answered "present" 7, not voting 214, as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER resumed the chair.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, would a motion to adjourn be in order?

The SPEAKER. It is in order if seconded by a majority of those present.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House do now adjourn. All those in favor of seconding the motion will rise. Twenty Members have risen. The Chair will count the number present. The Doorkeeper was directed to open the doors.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on my motion.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were 37 ayes and 15 noes.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays. All those in favor of taking the yeas and nays will rise. [After counting.] Fourteen Members have risen. Those opposed will rise. [After counting.] Forty-four Members have risen in the negative, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, August 22, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. J. L. Kibler, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O God our heavenly Father, we turn again to Thee for Thy guidance. We are entering upon a new and strange epoch in the world's history, and we can not see the end from the beginning. We need Thy guiding hand. We need Thy grace. We need wisdom from above to guide our doubtful footsteps aright. In the midst of all the confusion we have our tasks to perform and our problems to solve. May we still hold Thy hand and be guided by Thy principles. May we have grace and courage to walk by faith and to follow Thee until the day dawns and the shadows flee away. We ask it in Jesus' name. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS.

Mr. RANSDELL presented a petition of sundry citizens of Crowley, La., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FLETCHER presented a petition of the Marion County Board of Trade, of Ocala, Fla., praying for the passage of the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

JOSEPH GORMAN.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 6152) for the relief of Joseph Gorman, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 767) thereon.

SURVEY OF YOSEMITE PARK BOUNDARY.

Mr. MYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 2763) for the relief of Drenzy A. Jones and John G. Hopper, joint contractors, for surveying Yosemite Park boundary, which was heretofore referred to the Committee on Public Lands be withdrawn from that committee and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims, it being a claims bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Committee on Public Lands will be discharged and the bill will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 6373) to provide for the payment for certain lands within the former Flathead Indian Reservation in the State of Montana; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. THOMAS:

A bill (S. 6374) providing for the suspension of the requirement of assessment work on mining claims for the year 1914; to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. BURLEIGH:

A bill (S. 6375) granting an increase of pension to Isaac F. Kendall; to the Committee on Pensions.

PROPOSED ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

Mr. STERLING submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

SECURITIES OF COMMON CARRIERS.

Mr. WHITE. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the bill (H. R. 16586) to amend section 20 of an act to regulate commerce, to prevent overissues of securities by carriers, and for other purposes, in lieu of the one I presented a few days ago, which I desire to withdraw. The one I submitted misnumbered a section and therefore was not quite intelligent. I ask the leave of the Senate to withdraw the former amendment and to submit this amendment in its stead.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The former amendment will be withdrawn, and the amendment now submitted will be printed, and ordered to lie on the table.

POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] was heretofore appointed as a Senate conferee on the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system, and he requests to be excused from further service. The Chair hears no objection, and he is excused. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is appointed a conferee in his stead.

REPORT OF MASSACHUSETTS HOMESTEAD COMMISSION.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Massachusetts Legislature of 1912–13 authorized the appointment of what is called the Homestead Commission of Massachusetts to consider the question of municipal or other furnishing of homesteads for citizens under certain conditions. This commission was appointed and has made a very voluminous report, much of the information having been obtained from foreign sources through our State Department and in other ways. I think it is an important matter for consideration, and I ask that the report be printed as a Senate document. But before that is done it seems to me proper that it should be examined by the Committee on Printing, both as to the feasibility of the printing and to obtain an estimate of the cost of so doing. If it is proper to do so, I should like to have it referred to the Committee on Printing for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

ADDRESS BY A. L. MILLS ON FINANCIAL STATUS (S. DOC. NO. 567).

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, last week there was held in the city of Portland, Oreg., a convention of the buyers of the jobbing territory tributary to that city. The convention was composed of the business men and women of the Pacific coast and of the Northwest, men and women influential in the financial and business world. On the evening of the 14th instant they were the guests of the Jobbers and Manufacturers' Association of Portland, and on that occasion an address was delivered by Mr. A. L. Mills, who is, and for many years has been, the president of the First National Bank of that city, one of the largest and most prosperous financial institutions of the West. Besides his prominence in financial affairs in the West, Mr. Mills has been prominent in Republican politics and was a few years ago Speaker of the House of Representatives of the State of Oregon. He understands the financial and business as well as the political situation in this country, and I ask unanimous consent that his address may be printed as a public document. It is peculiarly appropriate at this time, because it is a complete answer to those who seem to enjoy prophesying industrial, commercial, and financial disaster. He takes an optimistic view of the financial situation not only in the Northwest but in the whole country, and his opinions are all the more valuable because of his prominence in business as well as in political life. It is remarkable that he attributes the present splendid condition of our business life largely to measures which have been passed by the present Congress, and outlines with reference to the American merchant marine a line of action which is now being pursued by the present administration. I trust that the Senate may consent to the publication of this splendid address as a public document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had, on August 22, 1914, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 654. An act to accept the cession by the State of Montana of exclusive jurisdiction over the lands embraced within the Glacier National Park, and for other purposes;

S. 1644. An act for the relief of May Stanley;

S. 5574. An act to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States;

S. 5977. An act to authorize Bryan Henry and Albert Henry to construct a bridge across a slough, which is a part of the Tennessee River, near Guntersville, Ala.; and

S. 6116. An act to amend section 195 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911.

LAWS OF THE PHILIPPINES (S. DOC. NO. 568).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the Philippines and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 6261) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase not to exceed 15,000,000 ounces of silver bullion, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not suppose the motion is debatable under the rule. I believe it is not at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill was read yesterday. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Finance on page 1, line 6.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, this is an important bill, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Camden	Fletcher	Martine, N. J.
Bankhead	Chamberlain	Gronna	Myers
Brady	Chilton	Hollis	Nelson
Brandegee	Culberson	James	Norris
Bryan	Cummins	Johnson	Overman
Burton	Dillingham	Lane	Perkins
Pittman	Sheppard	Thomas	White
Poindexter	Simmons	Thornton	Williams
Ransdell	Smith, Ga.	Tillman
Reed	Smoot	Weeks
Shafroth	Sterling	West

Mr. THORNTON. I was requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], and also that he is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] has been unavoidably called from the city.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. PAGE] on account of illness in his family.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] on account of illness, and to state that he is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]. I make this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. The Senator from New Hampshire has a pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], the Senator from West Virginia with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], the Senator from Wyoming with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], and the Senator from Utah with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. MYERS. I announce the necessary absence on official business of my colleague [Mr. WALSH].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. GORE, Mr. KENYON, Mr. KERN, Mr. OWEN, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. SAULSBURY, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. THOMPSON, and Mr. WALSH answered to their names when called.

Mr. CLAPP, Mr. SWANSON, and Mr. LEE of Maryland entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The amendment of the Committee on Finance will be stated.

The amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 1, line 6, before the word "million," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "fifteen," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to anticipate the requirements of the Treasury for silver bullion for the subsidiary coinage by purchase of bullion to an amount in the aggregate not exceeding 15,000,000 ounces, such purchases to be of the product of smelting works located within the United States, and to be made from time to time in his discretion, but limited to the period of six months from and after the passage of this act: Provided, That the price paid for such bullion shall not in any instance exceed the average price of silver bullion in the New York market for the six months beginning with the month of January, 1914, and ended with the month of June, 1914.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Utah to explain why it is necessary to buy this large amount of silver at this time?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that under the present law the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to purchase silver bullion for the coinage of subsidiary coin. There has been used for that purpose in the past between 3,000,000 and 4,000,000 ounces per year. This bill simply authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to anticipate the purchase of silver for that purpose not to exceed in the aggregate 15,000,000 ounces.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WEST. Will there be any unusual or abnormal quantity of silver coined or any more than is coined in the ordinary course of the business of the Government, or will it merely be held?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will allow me to first answer the question of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], then I shall answer the question propounded by the Senator from Georgia.

In further answer to the Senator from North Dakota, I wish to say that at this time, on account of conditions existing in the financial world, brought about by the war in Europe, the immediate demand for silver has ceased. There is no question that in a month or two there will not only be the usual demand for silver by the countries of Europe, but I anticipate a larger demand for it than we have ever had. History has shown that during and following the conclusion of a great war the demand for silver has always increased. Under such conditions people prefer metallic to paper money.

Mr. President, many of our mines in the West are in such shape that they can not suspend operations without a great loss to the mining companies. In some of the mines we have to contend with water, and unless the mines are in operation all the time they become flooded and the machinery badly damaged.

The smelting companies claim that they can not purchase and carry all the silver produced, but say they are perfectly willing to carry half of it. There is a production in this country of some sixty-odd million ounces of silver per annum, and, with the anticipated purchase as provided in this bill—it may not amount to more than $3,000,000 or $4,000,000, all told—at this time it may have the effect, and no doubt will have the effect, of allowing the mines to continue operations.

Mr. President, I want to call attention——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment. I want to call attention to the fact that for every ounce of silver produced in the ores of the West there is produced $2 in gold. Gold is what we, as well as the remainder of the world, want to-day. We are doing everything possible to maintain the amount of gold which we have; but if there is no sale for silver, and the silver mines are therefore closed, for every ounce of silver, which is worth about 58 cents, there will be $2 worth of gold that will remain in mother earth and not enter into the channels of trade.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I was going to ask the Senator from Utah if the real object of the pending bill is not to create a market for silver? There is no demand for silver, so far as the Treasury is concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Treasury Department purchased the other day 1,175,000 ounces of silver, and I expect within a few days, if it becomes necessary, it will make a further purchase.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will permit me, as I understand, the Treasury Department is now authorized under the law to purchase all the silver that is necessary for subsidiary coin?

Mr. SMOOT. For immediate use, that is true; and the object of this bill is to anticipate the requirements of the Government for not to exceed two or three years. In doing that, Mr. President, we will be keeping in employment in the western country thousands of men. Not only that, but we shall be assisting in the production of gold, which this country, as well as all the rest of the world, is clamoring for at the present time.

Mr. President, we in the western country are not asking to take care of the product of the mine outside of silver which the Government uses. Take copper, for instance. I have a letter here from Hon. D. C. Jackling in relation to the copper situation in the West. I want to read what Mr. Jackling says, to show the Senate that if silver were but a mere commodity, such as wheat, cotton, or copper, the West would not be asking for this legislation. Mr. Jackling says in a letter to me, dated August 13, 1914:

> It has been necessary at our copper properties to reduce our operating capacity to 50 per cent of its normal rate, and in doing this we have been compelled, with deep regret, to dispense with employees at our various properties whose annual pay roll amounts, directly and indirectly from $8,000,000 to $10,000,000; that is to say, that the curtailment of our operations has made it necessary for us to dispense with services of men, either fully or by placing them on half time, which is equivalent to having entirely released from 8,000 to 10,000 men, directly and indirectly, supported by our copper-producing industry; and as a direct result of this the gross earnings of our operations have been reduced by more than $30,000,000 per annum. In other words, we are turning into circulation that much less new value, which in normal times is equivalent to new money. This is only an illustration, as other things are going at about the same rate.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to know if I correctly understood the Senator as stating that in the production or mining of one dollar of silver there is involved necessarily the production of two dollars of gold?

Mr. SMOOT. Not necessarily; but, as a matter of fact, that is the case.

Mr. WHITE. That is usually so?

Mr. SMOOT. It is usually so, Mr. President.

Mr. WHITE. Then, another question. As I understand, this bill, the passage of which the Senator is advocating, leaves it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury as to whether this purchase shall be made?

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely; it is left in his hands entirely. Not only that, Mr. President, but, as I said before, it simply anticipates the requirements of the Government for two or three years. It will anticipate that demand if the Secretary immediately purchases the amount authorized; but I am quite positive it will not be necessary for him to do so. The Secretary of the Treasury told me day before yesterday that there was an inquiry from Holland as to whether several million ounces of silver could be furnished in case an order should be given.

Mr. President, if conditions were normal, if we had the transportation facilities at hand, and the financial situation in the world were such that business and trade could be conducted in regular order, we would not be asking for the Government to anticipate the purchase of a single ounce of silver. We are not asking the Government to help the industry of copper mining; we are not asking the Government to help business of the West in any way I know of. I will state, however, that a few have asked for funds to help them out in the moving of crops; but that has been denied them. We can get along if we can only provide work for the men in our mines, for mining is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, industry in the intermountain country. In view of the fact that the Senate yesterday voted an appropriation of several million dollars to provide war-risk insurance, and it is expected to vote upon measures involving many millions more to enable the Government of the United States to enter the transportation business and assist other industries of the country, the request for the advancement of three or four million dollars, as provided in the pending bill is a mere bagatelle, Mr. President. If financial conditions right themselves within the next 10 days, there will be no more silver purchased than would ordinarily be purchased by the Secretary of the Treasury; and, for the life of me, I can not see why there should be the least objection to the bill now under consideration.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEST. I asked the Senator a few moments ago if the proposed purchase of silver would result in any unusual or abnormal coinage of subsidiary silver, or would the silver be purchased merely to relieve an existing condition caused by the unusual depressed condition of certain lines of business in the country?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is entirely with the Secretary of the Treasury to decide as to whether there is such a demand in the country for more subsidiary silver coin as to justify its coinage. I will say to the Senator frankly that I do not believe that there will be such a demand. I think there will be only an ordinary demand, such as there was last year or the year before. This bill only provides that if, in his judgment, it is wise, the Secretary of the Treasury can anticipate the requirements for the purchase of silver up to 15,000,000 ounces.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator that this is not like an appropriation to help out any other industry, because silver is bought at 52 cents an ounce and the Government coins it and passes it off to the people at $1.29 an ounce. Consequently, every ounce of silver that may be bought under this appropriation will net to the Government Treasury two and one-half times what it cost.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, ultimately.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is absolutely true; but I did not desire to bring that question into the discussion, because I think, Mr. President, that the object of the bill is so plain upon its face and the results will be so beneficial that I can not see why anyone should object to it, especially as the cost will be nothing to the Government of the United States.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. Several questions suggest themselves. I do not understand that the Secretary of the Treasury contemplates selling to Holland any portion of the amount of silver which would be purchased?

Mr. SMOOT. No, Mr. President, he does not; and I want to say frankly to the Senator that he referred those who made the inquiry to the American Smelting & Refining Co., and I am positive that the American Smelting & Refining Co. gave the answer that they could furnish the silver.

Mr. BURTON. If this bill passes, what is contemplated? Will the silver bullion which is purchased be coined into subsidiary silver, or will it be retained as bullion in the Treasury?

Mr. SMOOT. It will be retained as bullion in the Treasury and coined as required.

Mr. BURTON. What are the limitations on the power of the Secretary of the Treasury now to purchase bullion for subsidiary coinage?

Mr. SMOOT. The law gives him the power to purchase bullion in the open market at the market price in sufficient quantity to coin subsidiary silver that may be required by the business of the country.

Mr. BURTON. That is, at any time he can purchase all the silver that is required in the ordinary course of trade to meet the requirements of users of subsidiary silver. He has full authority to do that now.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, Mr. President, and, as I have already said, that has amounted in the past to about three or four million ounces per year.

Mr. THOMAS obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment, in order that I may make an inquiry of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he has information which he can give us as to the amount of the fund accumulated by reason of the increase in the value of the silver due to its coinage; that is to say, what amount is to the credit of the Treasury?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not looked that up, and I can not say offhand what the amount is, but I can say to the Senator that it is a very large amount.

Mr. WALSH. That is to say, that on purchases heretofore made so much money has come into the Treasury as would be ample to make the purchases contemplated by this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, not only that, but I should judge, speaking offhand, many times the amount.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it has occurred to me that the modesty of this proposed measure may have been the cause of some question as to its real purpose, and that behind it might lie some ulterior motive not apparent upon the face of the bill and requiring additional legislation to make it effective.

The Secretary of the Treasury has under existing laws and regulations the power to supply the Treasury from time to time with such amount of silver bullion as may be necessary for the purposes of subsidiary coinage. That amount is, of course, limited in its nature and seldom, if ever, exceeds 3,000,000 ounces per annum. Since the act of 1900 establishing the gold standard in the United States there have been, if I am correctly informed, no purchases of silver bullion by the Government for any other than purposes of subsidiary coinage. There was at that time on hand a good deal of bullion, a part of which from time to time has been coined into standard dollars and of which the people of the country have the benefit through the circulation of paper currency redeemable in silver. Our only purpose, I can assure the Senate, is to accomplish what has been so well stated by the Senator from Utah.

The silver industry has been carried on under extremely adverse circumstances ever since 1893, and under circumstances which were not at all propitious for a number of years prior to that time. The amounts of silver which are produced from the ores of the western mines are very small, relatively speaking; and it is equally true that the grades of ore as to other metallic contents are constantly decreasing and becoming more refractory as depth is gained. Hence, silver and gold in my State, at least, are largely by-products of ores containing baser metals in commercial quantities; but the prices for these baser metals are at times so near the point of cost of production that the by-product of gold and silver is largely relied upon for the profitable working of the mines. Hence, whatever disturbs the value of these by-products seriously disturbs the operation of the properties from which the ores are mined.

There have been times in the mining history of the West when great quantities of silver ore have been produced from bonanza deposits whose ores carried silver as their chief metallic ingredient, and perhaps the apprehension that the vast quantity of silver found in these bonanzas might produce a flood of silver had much to do with crystallizing the sentiment against the use of the metal which found ultimate expression in its demonetization. Those bonanza days are past and gone. I do not think they ever will return. A great many miners and prospectors indulge the hope that they will find and uncover other great deposits of gold and silver within the territory of the United States and that we will mine these metals, as we used to, without reference to the baser metals with which they go in combination. Whether that be so or not, however, is a matter of speculation. We must legislate now with conditions as they are. Now, it is, I think, perfectly obvious that the owners of mines producing a refractory ore—and they are nearly all refractory ores now, because they are mined away below the surface—which contains, we will say, 10 per cent of lead, two-tenths of an ounce of gold, and 3 ounces of silver to the ton, and who must depend for the prosperity of the business upon their ability to dispose of the small metallic content of the by-product of gold and silver, have ruin staring them in the face if the marketable possibilities of those two metals are very seriously disturbed.

I might instance Camp Creede, in my State, which in 1892, 1893, 1894, and 1895 was producing vast quantities of high silver grade ore, but which to-day is producing ores from the same veins at a lower level that carry only from 3 to 5 ounces of silver per ton and one-fifth of an ounce of gold per ton. These mines constitute, in the mountains of the West—and I speak of the mountains as distinguished from the agricultural sections of the State—the prime industry of those sections, in some instances their sole industry; and whole communities are therefore dependent entirely upon the constant operations of the mines for a livelihood. I can name half a dozen communities in my State, as the Senator from Utah can in his, in which the production of ores carrying lead, zinc, and by-products of gold and silver constitutes practically the sole occupation of the people. The dismay which present conditions have created in the minds of the men and women of such communities can be very easily imagined, and they feel, and feel very keenly, that they are justified as American citizens in calling upon the Government of the United States at this crisis to do something to relieve the tensity of the situation.

Mr. President, I am not going to hark back to the days of bimetallism, or when the bimetallic issue was acute, for the purpose of arousing any controversy. Nevertheless, I feel that this situation justifies recalling the fact that the position now occupied by the silver metal has been caused very largely by adverse legislation enacted by the Congress of the United States, and that because of the operation of that legislation, harmonizing with that of the other great nations of the world, the value of silver has been more than cut in two, and its use as a money metal has been largely decreased and would have been entirely done away with but for the fact that the metal persists as a money metal and discharges a part of the monetary functions with which it was originally endowed, in common with gold, in spite of adverse legislation, in spite of the ban which has been placed upon it by commercial opinion, and in spite of every adverse circumstance.

Gold and silver are the money metals of the Constitution, and, while customs and laws have changed, the provisions of the Federal Constitution concerning the subject are to-day what they were when that great instrument was adopted by the 13 original States. Not until the end of the Franco-Prussian War, when Germany stood with her heel upon the neck of crushed and prostrate France, levying upon her a war tribute of five thousand milliards of francs, to be paid before her territory would be evacuated, was there any serious disturbance in the monetary world between the operations of gold and silver as money, which were conjointly discharging the financial obligations of all peoples and were given equal credit in the markets and exchanges of every civilized nation of the world. It was under those circumstances that the German Diet deliberately demonetized one of the metals, the favorite metal of the people of France, the metal which its citizens hoarded in their savings, which always maintained its standard of equality at a fixed ratio among that great people and all its customers. For the purpose of doubling the burden upon that crushed and conquered people the monstrous crime of silver's demonetization was conceived and carried into execution, thus disturbing the financial equilibrum all over the world. This action was followed by the United States in 1873 by similar legislation, enacted at a time when silver bullion was intrinsically worth more than silver coin, notwithstanding the pretense that such legislation was essential to overcome an impending flood, a threatened overflow in overwhelming abundance of the white metal to the disturbance of all values and the probable disintegration of business.

Mr. President, after a long struggle the purpose of that policy was accomplished. Like others, I am bound to recognize the logic of events, although I shall never cease to protest against them. My purpose in referring to the subject is to emphasize in this connection the incontrovertible fact that, as a result of hostile legislation, the producers of the silver metal of the United States in the last 30 years have been deliberately robbed not only of millions but of hundreds of millions of dollars of value which they otherwise would have enjoyed and to which they were entitled by every rule of justice, which values have been absorbed partly by the United States through the coinage of silver and the emission of silver certificates against silver bullion, but far more largely by Great Britain, then as now the greatest customer and consumer of silver in the world, by reason of its dependencies and its oriental trade.

When we consider the unjust, far-reaching, and appalling effect of this legislation upon the property rights and interests of a great section of the American people, is it too much in this crisis to ask of the Congress of the United States merely that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be given power in his discretion to anticipate necessary purchases under the law during the next six months, so that the tension may be relieved and these mines kept open? Why, Mr. President, a more modest request, in view of the arraignment that can be made of the manner in which this metal and its producers have been treated, could not very well be conceived.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will permit me, I desire to say that I do not wish to be understood as opposing this measure; but I thought the Senate should have the information which it has received, and the country was entitled to know why it is necessary for the Government of the United States to take seven or eight million dollars and buy silver bullion at a time when nearly all the nations of Europe are engaged in war.

I believe I can say that I would be the last one to oppose any measure that would be of benefit to the great West; but, looking at it from the standpoint of financiering, it seems to me we may just as well say that we should buy a few million dollars' worth of grain and store it as to take this amount of money and buy silver bullion, when, as has been admitted both by the Senator from Utah and by other Senators, under existing law the Secretary of the Treasury can now buy all the silver that is needed for the coinage of subsidiary coin.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am certainly not complaining of any inquiry as to this measure, and certainly not of any inquiry directed to its purport and its object; and if I were I certainly could not complain of any inquiry made by the Senator from North Dakota, who is always fair, who always acts as his conscience suggests, and who, in whatever he does, is prompted by the highest motives. He is entitled to the information about which he made inquiry, as are other Senators concerning this or any other exigent measure of legislation.

But, Mr. President, there is a wide difference between the interference of the Government in an emergency of this kind and a bill for the purchase of wheat or of cotton. I want the Senate to understand, and I can not too greatly emphasize the fact, that notwithstanding adverse legislation silver is a money metal. It does the monetary work of more than one-half of the swarming millions upon this globe, and it does much of the monetary work of the people of those nations which have degraded and demonetized it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. OVERMAN. I should like to inquire whether the purpose of this resolution is to help out the silver miners or to increase the amount of money put into circulation?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the primary purpose of it is to aid in an exigency with which the mining operators of our section of the country are now confronted, precisely as the proposed legislation to relieve the cotton farmers of the Senator's section is designed to meet a similar exigency.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is the reason I asked the question. Is there any reason why——

Mr. THOMAS. I was going to say—I have not yet finished my answer—that its effect, of course, will be to provide the Government with a material which will ultimately be added to the coin of the country.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is not the primary object of the bill, is it?

Mr. THOMAS. The primary object of the bill is, of course, to meet the emergency I have described.

Mr. OVERMAN. Is there any more reason why this bill should be passed than why Congress should pass a bill to provide that cotton should be bought by the Government at 10 cents per pound?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; and I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. I just want to make a suggestion as to a portion of the question of the Senator. He asks if the object of this is to increase the circulating medium, as I understand. It is not, in any way, nor to increase the purchase of silver, but simply to anticipate the purchase of silver necessary for subsidiary coinage to the extent of 15,000,000 ounces in six months instead of scattering it over a longer time.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, it is not to increase the circulation.

Mr. FALL. It does not increase the amount on hand.

Mr. THOMAS. The amount the Government purchases will be used as the requirements of the Treasury may be in the future to supply the people with additional fractional currency.

Mr. FALL. The object of the bill is not to increase the amount of silver circulation.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly not.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I will yield in just a moment. I can answer but one Senator at a time. It is designed to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to secure silver now instead of waiting six or eight months or a year from now to secure the same silver. I now yield to the Senator from Georgia with pleasure.

Mr. WEST. I desire to ask the Senator from Colorado if it would not be purely a speculative matter? Suppose silver should go down and the Government needed it, would not the Government have lost by this trade?

Mr. THOMAS. That depends on what the Senator would consider a loss.

Mr. WEST. Of course, if it increased in value, the Government would have gained?

Mr. THOMAS. It depends on what the Senator would consider a loss. A great many years ago, when I lived in Leadville, I had a client who one day bought 150 lots at $125 apiece. He sold them the next week at $300 apiece, and the week afterwards they were sold for $600 apiece. When he heard of it, he said he was losing money in the thousands, and would soon be in the poorhouse. The Government can not lose any money, because the Government coins this silver into fractional currency, and the citizen accepts it and pays it out for legitimate obligations at the rate of $1.29 per ounce. The Government, in other words, will make by it and the people will derive some benefit from it, with silver purchased at 52 cents an ounce and circulated at $1.29. Of course, if the silver should fall below 52, to 50 cents, the Government would lose 2 cents an ounce, and in that view it might be said to sustain a loss. But its enormous profit will be consequent upon the fact that the thing purchased assumes its coin and loses silver value as soon as it receives the stamp of the mint.

Mr. SMOOT. If it goes to 60 cents an ounce, the Government will make the difference.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes. As the Senator from Utah suggests, if silver goes to 60 cents an ounce, the Government, on the other hand, of course, makes the difference between what it must pay at this time and the higher market price it may command.

Mr. WEST. The Senator will admit that when it falls to 52 cents and the Government coins it on the basis of $1.29, that part of it is fiat money just like the issue of paper.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not going to get into a discussion of fiat money at the present time. I might easily establish the proposition that gold is fiat money, since its value in exchange comes from custom and legislation. But silver is not fiat money in the sense which the Senator's query would imply. It never was such fiat money, and human legislation is powerless as long as the present form of civilization exists to make it such.

Now, just one word in further answer to the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and I am through. There is this distinction between the suggestion he made and that which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] made and the purpose of this bill. The Government ever since its foundation has been a coiner and purchaser of silver. For a part of the time its mints have been open to the free coinage of silver. For the remainder it has been a purchaser of silver, and it must, whether the bill passes or not, continue to be a purchaser of silver that it may supply the people with a portion, and a very essential portion, of their currency. That condition does not apply to cotton; it does not apply to wheat; it does not apply to any other commodity. Possibly it applies to copper in a modified form, as that is a part of the metallic currency of the country; but that situation is by no means an analogous one.

So the object of the bill being as was stated by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], I certainly hope it will not meet with any serious opposition.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not wish this bill to pass without entering a protest against it. If I were going to consult only the interests of the industry which is involved, I should, of course, be very glad to have the bill passed, because it would furnish a market for a part of the product of the silver and lead mines and would keep a larger number of men employed temporarily than otherwise may be the case. If I were going to consult my own personal interests, I would be glad to have the bill passed, because it would subserve those interests. But, Mr. President, I think the bill is wrong in principle and is unwise from every sane business standpoint.

I am not going to be involved in a discussion of the money question, which has nothing of pertinency bearing on this particular bill. Almost everyone agrees that our solution of the monetary question has been wise and is final, and the producers of silver have accepted it and made their business arrangements accordingly.

The only possible theory on which this purchase can be made is that temporarily it will help out the producers of silver and lead, silver, of course, being the commodity covered in this act. I think it would help them out temporarily. I think it would furnish a market for some of their product. But if the conditions continue for any considerable time as they are to-day the reaction will come, when they will be in a worse condition than they are to-day, because three or four or five months from now the Government will not be able to buy any silver and may not be able to buy it for a considerable time thereafter. Therefore, while it might at once give additional employment to some men, a few months from now it might take away the employment which they would otherwise have, and during the winter season, when they will need the employment more than they do to-day.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I simply wish to say in reference to that, that of course we can take the chances of what the future will bring forth. We are confronted now with a condition——

Mr. WEEKS. I understand, Mr. President, and that is——

Mr. THOMAS. We may be wrong about it, but we believe that the exigencies of the next few months are going to create such a demand for silver, not only in the United States but everywhere, as that, the present situation being tided over, the industry will not have the slightest difficulty in taking care of itself.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator from Massachusetts will yield, I will say that the Bank of England has taken every ounce of silver on the London market at 53 cents. The nations of Europe are bound to have silver. There is not a single bank in all Europe that is now paying any gold. Consequently the demands of commerce and credit will have to be shifted to silver. That is going to make an increased demand for silver, and that will make an increased value for that metal.

I want to say that under the law in all the Governments of Europe at the present time silver can be coined, and each one of the countries at war can make $2.50 for every dollar they invest in silver. That is going to make a great increase in the value of silver. The European nations are in stress for money, and naturally they will have to go to silver. The result will be that when they buy an ounce of silver for 52 cents or 53 cents and coin it into a dollar at $1.29 or $1.32, you can readily see that it is something to their advantage, which they will seize upon in times of emergency.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, the Senator from Colorado has just presented a better argument than I can against this bill. He says that the Bank of England has bought all the available silver bullion there is in that country, and that all the belligerents of Europe will need silver in order to carry on their military operations.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But the difficulty is now in getting it transported to London. That is the reason why we have not any market in this country.

Mr. WEEKS. There are liners leaving the port of New York for Europe every day. I stated yesterday that there are 130 British ships in Atlantic ports waiting for cargoes to take to Europe. There are ample transportation facilities for any product like silver, which does not take any considerable space; and if the demand exists abroad as the Senator suggests, it is a conclusive argument against our Government spending seven and a half or eight million dollars at this time to buy silver to be used for coinage which may not be required for months ahead.

Fifty-two cents an ounce for 15,000,000 ounces I figure would be something over seven and one-half million dollars; but in any case, the Government is asked to buy a product which in effect is a commercial product, and to hold that product until it needs to use it to be coined as subsidiary coin. The same principle is not quite applicable for the Government to buy wheat or to buy cotton or to buy corn, because the Government does not need those products in its own operations except in a limited way; but as far as the real question involved is concerned, it is exactly the same, because the whole purpose of the bill is to help the silver miner of the West.

Using that argument, why should not the Government help the cotton planter of the South, or the wheat raiser of the Northwest, or the corn producer of the Middle West, or the cotton manufacturers or the shoe manufacturers of New England, if you please, who, in order to keep their men employed, have manufactured more goods than they can sell and are holding them in storage, hoping that a market will develop?

I did not intend to say more than a word, Mr. President, but I want to emphasize my opinion that the principle involved in this legislation is unwise and may lead us into a course which will be extremely undesirable.

Mr. SIMMONS. Before the Senator from Massachusetts takes his seat——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator if he has not overlooked the fact that the bill does not require the Secretary of the Treasury to buy 15,000,000 ounces, but it only authorizes him to do it in case his judgment shall approve.

Mr. WEEKS. Then the bill has no value, if the Secretary does not buy the silver.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me say to the Senator we have felt that this situation calls for a broadening of our currency. We have just passed legislation which will authorize the issue of additional paper currency which may amount, if the banks take out the full amount authorized, to a billion and three-quarters probably. Might there not be the same necessity in this situation for broadening our subsidiary coinage that there is for broadening our paper currency in denominations that are suitable to larger transactions? We have felt that the situation requires this broadening of our paper currency. Why not broaden at the same time our subsidiary coinage? Of course that is a question which would be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury under the discretion that is imposed upon him in the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. I am somewhat familiar with currency matters, and I never have heard a suggestion made that there is any requirement for a material increase in the subsidiary coinage. There may be some temporary demand from some particular locality, but, on the other hand, there is much more subsidiary coinage in many places than is desired, so it becomes a nuisance, and I notice that there is now in the Treasury, available for issue, more than $23,000,000 of such currency. Furthermore, let me call to the attention of the Senate the fact that even if the whole amount were purchased and coined at once, it would have no material effect on the total volume of our circulation outstanding. We authorized the issuing of $500,000,000 of emergency currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland Act. Very much of that is already in circulation, I think some two or three hundred millions of it. This seven and a half million dollars of silver which might be coined would not amount to anything compared with the total volume of circulation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course the increase in the volume of our currency would be inconsequential, but the increase in our subsidiary coinage would be very considerable.

The Senator says he has never heard the suggestion that there was any lack of subsidiary currency in this country. I think the Senator does not understand the needs of certain portions of the country or he would not make that statement.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask——

Mr. SIMMONS. There may be no necessity for it in the section of the country from which the Senator comes, but in the section of the country from which I come I know for years, even under normal conditions, during the crop-harvesting season, our farmers have experienced great inconvenience on account of the lack or inadequacy of our subsidiary coinage. For instance, in the South we are at this season of the year beginning to pick cotton. It is picked by men who can make about a dollar or a dollar and a half a day. They want their money every night. It takes an enormous amount of quarters and dollars and half dollars to pay them off. There has been felt in the South I know for years a need for more fractional currency.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I do not think there has ever been any testimony before any committee of Congress—at least not in recent years—which would bear out the Senator's statement. Quite likely there may be at some time in some place a demand for additional subsidiary coinage. I think I have heard personally during my service in Congress as many as two or three hundred men all versed in monetary matters discussing various phases of currency and banking, and I never heard a suggestion from one of them that the amount of subsidiary coinage should be increased. If there is such a demand, I think the Senator will find that the Treasury Department has the coinage available on hand and can send it to the particular locality in case it is needed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WEEKS. I will yield first to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator said a short time ago there are now easy means of transportation from New York to London. Does not the Senator realize the fact that the exportation of gold from this country was checked by reason of the high rates of insurance that were imposed upon persons who desired to take it, and is it not a fact that if German cruisers found this contraband of war in shipment they would take it; to cover that risk do not the insurance companies naturally make a high rate upon it now?

Mr. WEEKS. There are no German steamers on the high seas to-day. The merchant ships on the high seas are those belonging to nations which control the naval situation abroad. There is ample transportation, I repeat, in British steamers or French steamers, Italian steamers or Norwegian steamers or Scandinavian steamers, and steamers of the smaller European nations.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is it not a fact that insurance companies now charge an enormous premium by reason of the transportation of either gold or silver?

Mr. WEEKS. At the time the Senator has in mind the insurance rates were high, from 10 to 20 per cent, but they have been coming down as the situation has cleared itself until they are now quoted at from 2 to 3 per cent. Lloyds are insuring all kinds of products on English steamers at 3 per cent or less.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Even 3 per cent is an enormous rate.

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The ordinary rate on shipments of gold is one-quarter of 1 per cent.

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to make a suggestion in reference to the question asked by the Senator from Massachusetts. He seemed to imply by his question that there was a need in the country of more subsidiary silver coin and that this bill would bring about an increase. I wish to direct attention to the fact that regardless of whether there is a demand or not for more silver coin this bill does not even pretend to give any additional coin, and it would not result in the coinage of a single nickel in addition to that provided for by law.

Mr. WEEKS. I am greatly obliged to the Senator for calling that to my attention. In answering other questions I overlooked it, but the statement is entirely correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. WEEKS. I was about to yield the floor. I will yield to the Senator if the Senator desires.

Mr. PITTMAN. I was waiting until the Senator yielded the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, as has been said by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], the amount of money here involved is insignificant; that is, it is insignificant so far as the inflation of our currency is concerned—it does not amount to anything. The total appropriation does not amount to much more than an appropriation for some little river carried in the river and harbor appropriation bill; but while the appropriation, so far as the Government is concerned, does not amount to anything, as has been said by the Senator, it does amount to a great deal to a great industry in this country that has been constantly neglected by the Congress of the United States by reason of an innate prejudice on the part of many Members of this body—a prejudice that prevents them from thinking favorably of silver, a prejudice that will not let them draw the distinction between free coinage of silver and a purchase of silver by the Government under existing laws. That is the trouble about this whole matter.

Here is the situation: Is there a Senator in this body who does not realize that it is to the interest of this Government to protect the production of gold and silver—not silver alone, but both of them? Is not that a question of interest to this country? Do not the Members of this Senate who have gone so thoroughly into the financial question and explained it to this body know that one of the most vital questions facing the country to-day is the production and supply of gold? Do they not know that the supply of gold is wrapped up in the supply of silver? If not, I want to now tell them about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is the Senator from Nevada referring to me?

Mr. PITTMAN. I was simply looking at the Senator from North Carolina because of his pleasant face.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator from Nevada, if he was referring to the remark I made about the inconsequential increase in our circulation, that if he thought from that remark I was antagonistic to this measure he was badly mistaken.

Mr. PITTMAN. I realize that the Senator from North Carolina is in favor of the bill. I want to say that the expression used both by the Senator from North Carolina and by the Senator from Massachusetts, that this authorization for an advance purchase of silver, not a new purchase, but for the purpose of anticipating a purchase that the Government would have to make in a short time anyway, amounting in all not to exceed six million or seven million dollars, while it is inconsequential to the Government of the United States, so far as the money is concerned, while it is not an iota in comparison with the appropriations in the river and harbor bill, in the agricultural bill or in the Indian appropriation bill, or in any other appropriation bill, it is absolutely vital to a large part of the production of gold and silver in this country, for gold and silver are found together in the same ores. If you strike down the silver value at this time, you will strike down the production of gold with it.

The Senator from Massachusetts says that the argument that there is a market in England destroys the arguments for this bill. Let me tell you this: While there is a market in England, the man who has the little mill that is producing bullion which is part silver and part gold, but which has too much silver in it for him to go to the mint of the United States and get cash for it, does not know where that market is; he does not know where to go to sell his bullion, because the only people to whom he can apply to buy that bullion are the people who have heretofore been known as constituting the smelter trust. In a speech delivered on this floor once before, I charged that it appeared as though the smelting trust were trying to take advantage of this occasion; and I repeat that the evidence indicates that they were trying to take advantage of this occasion.

About two weeks ago the Treasury Department purchased 1,300,000 ounces of silver and announced that the Treasury Department intended to protect silver at 52 cents. What was the result? The day before that announcement was made silver was down to 50 cents; the minute the Government made that announcement silver went up to 56 cents. Why was that? It was not on account of the purchase of 1,300,000 ounces of silver; that was infinitesimal; it was because the buyers of bullion in this country knew that they would not be able to go to the little mill man and to the little smelter man and offer them any price they wanted to offer for their bullion. They knew that they had the Government of the United States standing between them and their victim and saying, "You will have to pay at least 52 cents an ounce for that bullion or you can not have it," and therefore they were compelled to cease their bear tactics. Does it not look like that? Does this Government mind authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make an advance purchase of bullion if it will protect against such a trust as that?

There is another thing. If you permit the bullion buyers in this country to bear down the price of silver, they will shut down the mines which produce your gold and your silver; and there is not a financier in this body to-day but knows that the production of these metals is essential to the prosperity of the country. It is a vital proposition.

I want to say to you now that even those of us who once favored a greater recognition of silver are not making such arguments now; we are not advocating that at all; but I want to say this—and I want to say it in all frankness—that western Senators have been very generous in their consideration of other portions of this country in their votes for enormous appropriations.

The United States has not bought cotton, but the Government of the United States to-day is offering to appropriate $30,000,000 for the transportation of cotton. The United States Government has not purchased any cotton, but the United States Government is appropriating millions every year, and has appropriated millions every year, for the building of levees on the Mississippi River, which, in my opinion, serve no other purpose than to protect the cotton planters in the bottoms of that valley. The Government of the United States is not buying corn and wheat and oats, but the Government of the United States is appropriating millions of dollars out of the Treasury of this country every year for the benefit of the agricultural products of this country, and no one is complaining about it if the farming industry needs and requires that help. We are all in favor of it, because the prosperity of one is the prosperity of all. If conditions are such in this country that cotton will be destroyed or that wheat or corn or any other natural product in this country will be destroyed without help, then we believe that it is time for the Government to step in and give its aid. We believe the same thing with regard to the shipping of this country to-day, and I say to you on the same ground that it is now time that the Government step in in this emergency and say, "We will anticipate the needs of this Government for silver and buy silver bullion now instead of waiting for a year to buy." That is all this bill means.

If the price of silver is 53 cents in London, then under this bill there will not be an ounce of silver bought by the Government, because the Government is not permitted to buy at over 53 cents. If the price is 56 cents, as it now is, under this bill there will not be an ounce purchased. The only occasion for the Government to buy is when some artificial condition or some premeditated act drives the price down to below 53 cents an ounce. I do not believe that there will ever be any need to purchase an ounce of silver under this bill. I think the declaration of this body that the Government is willing to buy will stop the purchasers of bullion in this country from attempting to bear the price below 52 cents an ounce.

I therefore desire to offer an amendment to the bill. I wish to say that I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] that this bill either means that the Treasury shall buy bullion when it goes below 52 or it does not mean anything. There is no use in authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to do something that he already has the power to do. I believe in directing him to do what you want him to do, if it is the right thing. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and ask that it be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add the following:

Provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase at least 2,500,000 ounces of silver each month for three months after the passage of this act, provided it can be obtained at the price limited in this act.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I sincerely trust that the amendment will not be adopted. I want the bill, if possible, to be passed in its original form. I want the power left entirely in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not want the Government of the United States to purchase anything that is not absolutely required or the need for which is not anticipated, and I believe, Mr. President, that the bill in its original form is all that we want in the Western States. While of course under other circumstances, as a western man, I perhaps would vote for the amendment, I shall not ask the Senate to vote for it, and I shall not vote for it myself, because I think it is unnecessary and may be the means of bringing on a longer discussion and involving other questions in the other House than if we pass the bill just as it is. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I hope that the Senator from Nevada will not insist upon his amendment. The Secretary of the Treasury has been very kind in relation to this matter. I went down to the Treasury Department about a week or ten days ago and told him the conditions, stating that the American Smelting & Refining Co. had stated that they would advance but 25 cents an ounce for silver at that time. The department stated that they felt that there ought to be something done to encourage the miners, and they further stated that purchases of silver would be made.

I also went to see the Director of the Mint, Mr. Roberts, who has occupied that position for years, and who is one of the best-informed men upon the subject in the country, and he told me that he would recommend the purchase of 1,175,000 ounces of silver a week for a number of weeks. That being the case, the Treasury Department being in sympathy with this movement, it seems to me that we ought to leave it to their discretion. I therefore hope the Senator from Nevada will not insist upon his amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I had the pleasure of also discussing the matter with the Treasury Department at about the time the Senator from Colorado had his discussion with the department, and was assured by the Director of the Mint that, in his opinion, they had complete authority to purchase at any time any amount of silver they saw fit for subsidiary coin; that they intended to use their judgment in the purchase of silver, and that they would purchase about 1,500,000 ounces of silver a week for such time as conditions required. In accordance with that, they commenced to purchase silver, and I was informed a few days ago by the Director of the Mint that they intended to continue those purchases.

In my opinion, this bill adds no authority to what the Treasury Department already has. If there is any reason at all for this bill, let us be sincere about it and require that some silver shall be purchased. What is the use of authorizing something that is already authorized? Is there a question as to whether or not you want the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase at least 7,500,000 ounces of silver in the next three months? That does not amount to a million and a half ounces a week. I am not placing the amount to be purchased beyond what the Director of the Mint said that he would purchase without this bill. I am placing the amount at exactly what he said he would purchase. I am only seeking to provide for the next three months, because there will be another session of Congress in that time, and if we wish to we can repeal this bill when there shall only have been expended enough money to purchase probably 7,500,000 ounces of silver.

Mr. FLETCHER. Would not such a requirement cause the price of silver to go up?

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Florida says if we require the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase silver its price will go up right away. He is right, but if that be the case the Secretary will not be required under this bill to purchase it, but he will be prevented from purchasing it, because if it goes above 53 cents he can not purchase it under the bill.

Mr. PITTMAN subsequently said: I submit without reading the following telegrams, to be incorporated as a part of my remarks of Saturday last.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

AUGUST 7, 1914.

JOHN G. KIRCHEN,
President Nevada Mine Operators' Association,
Tonopah, Nev.:

Your telegram of 6th relative to precarious condition of market for silver and the unfortunate effect on mines of the State, and requesting that action be taken to obtain purchase of 25,000,000 ounces by the Treasury was received to-day. Had the telegram read to the Senate, and, together with other western Senators, discussed existing emergency. We are assured will have active cooperation of Treasury Department. Will take matter up with McAdoo for definite action at earliest possible moment.

KEY PITTMAN.

AUGUST 12, 1914.

JOHN G. KIRCHEN,
President Nevada Mine Operators' Association,
Tonopah, Nev.:

Had further interview with Treasury Department to-day. Was assured that Government would support market at 52 cents for reasonable length of time. Government cooperating with American buyers of silver bullion to sustain the market. Government proposes to take half of that purchased by American buyers from American mines at 52 cents. Director Roberts expects much better market and urges the mines to continue operations as long as possible. He states that there was a report to-day that 60 was bid in London for silver, but was uninformed as to the extent of the demand. Since interviews have received a telephone message from Director of Mint stating that he had ordered the purchase of 1,175,000 ounces of silver at 52 at San Francisco, Denver, and Philadelphia.

KEY PITTMAN.

AUGUST 22, 1914.

JOHN G. KIRCHEN,
President Nevada Mine Operators' Association,
Tonopah, Nev.:

Committee amended bill by substituting "fifteen" for "twenty-five." Amendment offered by me requiring Treasurer to purchase at least 2,500,000 ounces per month defeated. So the question of purchase is still left to discretion of Treasurer, even if bill passes the House. Advise mine operators' association, miners' union and other unions, civic bodies, and people generally to strongly represent to department necessity for purchasing silver.

KEY PITTMAN.

Mr. THOMAS. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not going to go over the ground discussed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] in regard to what happened to silver years ago and as to whether that action was just or unjust. It does not seem to me that that question is involved here.

I want to call attention, however, to the fact that the passage of this bill will not mean an increase in the coinage of silver. If this bill as it is now before the Senate becomes a law, it will not mean an increase in the coinage to the amount of one penny. It simply provides that we shall purchase within the next six months what under ordinary circumstances we would, perhaps, be several years in purchasing under the law. If the bill shall have any effect at all, it will be to increase the price of silver temporarily, and also the value of silver stocks and stock in silver-mining corporations; but after we have purchased the 15,000,000 ounces provided for in the bill there will be a long season when no silver will be purchased, and it seems to me that unless there shall be some other contributing cause elsewhere silver will then take a slump, which will be much worse than the one it has taken recently.

I believe, Mr. President, that we ought to hesitate somewhat in passing bills through this body simply on the cry that the war in Europe makes them necessary. Why, you could pass an elephant through this Chamber if you put a tag on it and labeled it "a war-emergency proposition."

We are now about to pass a bill which, if it has any effect whatever, means that the Secretary of the Treasury shall go out into the market and purchase silver. What reason is given for it? When the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is asked to give a reason for the passage of this bill, he says that at present the silver mines are shut down, throwing men out of employment; that the price of silver has been declining; and that therefore the Government ought to go out and buy it in order to keep up the price and keep men in employment. Of course, it is a worthy object always to keep men in employment and to keep enterprises going, if we can, but I do not know why there is anything sacred about this one enterprise which should impel the Government, because it happens to be depressed, to go out and purchase its product in order to keep its price high in the market.

The reason given by the Senator from Utah and others who have advocated the passage of the bill has been that on account of the war now raging in Europe silver can not be shipped over to Europe, and therefore the market has been to that extent curtailed. Why, Mr. President, that applies to other things. Out in the West for some time—and the same condition exists to some extent still—the farmers have been holding their wheat and the railroads have been refusing to accept shipments of it. Why? Because they are unable to get vessels to take it across the ocean. Is there any proposition pending here to buy the farmers' wheat in order to keep the price of it up because it can not be shipped to Europe without great risk? Is there any more reason why we should not strive to bring about prosperity among the farming class than there is that we should among the silver miners of the West? Is there any reason why any other line of industry should not receive the financial assistance of the Government on occasions of this kind, if we are under obligations to render such assistance to the silver miners?

I have nothing, of course, against the silver miner or the silver-mine owner; but, as I said a while ago, I believe that while this would give an impetus now to stocks of that kind the slump would come afterwards when we ceased to buy. It does not mean an increase in the way of coinage.

One Senator has made an argument in favor of the bill that we need more subsidiary coinage. If it can be shown that that is true, I am certainly willing and ready to vote in favor of the increase of subsidiary coinage if we need it; but this bill does not pretend to do that. This bill will not increase the circulating medium.

The Senator from Colorado says, and gives that as an argument, that we can buy this silver for 52 or 53 cents an ounce, and more than double its value when we coin it into money. We can do that just the same when we buy it under the present law. It will not make a particle of difference. We will not coin any more under this bill than we will under the law that exists, so that the Government will not make any more money. If it is money that we want to make, then we ought to try to get the market for silver down, so that we can buy it still cheaper. If it is money that we want to make, if we wish to make a profit out of it, then we ought not to stop at 15,000,000 ounces. We ought to buy all the silver in the world and double its value by coining it into dollars.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that the statement I made was simply to demonstrate that there could be no loss whatever, because we buy the silver at 52 cents an ounce and coin it into something that we pass to the people, in full payment of our debts, to the extent of $1.29 an ounce.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is correct.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Consequently, it is not like buying something that you take a hazard on.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe we are going to lose, unless the value of silver should go down and we could afterwards buy it cheaper; but I am not advocating that. I am not trying to have the Government make a profit out of the silver miner. I should like to have him make all possible legitimate profit out of his business. I have nothing against him; but I do not see any reason why we should select him out and have the Government buy his product rather than the product of any other industry.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Does not the Senator recognize that all nations in the world have bought silver?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And nations have never bought wheat or corn.

Mr. NORRIS. They all buy silver, and we are buying silver now. This bill does not provide that in the end we shall buy any more silver than we would buy if we did not pass this legislation. It simply provides that we shall buy it now instead of next year, not because we can get it cheaper, but in order to keep up the price so that it will not be cheaper.

If the fact that our Government buys silver and that all nations buy it is the reason for it, then let me suggest that the Government is a very large purchaser of shoes. It buys millions of shoes every year for its soldiers; and, like silver, all Governments buy shoes. All the nations of the world buy shoes. Then why not let the Government buy, within the next month or two, all the shoes that ordinarily we would buy during the next year?

Mr. FALL and Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield, and to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from New Mexico. Then I will yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. FALL. I think the Government of the United States has been protecting the shoe manufacturer, if I recollect aright, for a good many years, as well as the cotton manufacturer and other manufacturers of the East. It has been extending its aid and assistance to them by the protective tariff. I have not heard of anything of that kind in favor of the silver miner of the West.

Mr. NORRIS. It has protected silver by the very purchase of silver. It has furnished a market for the silver.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from New Mexico yield to me for a question?

Mr. FALL. I spoke only through the courtesy of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. Is it not true that there is a very considerable duty on lead ore, and that that duty greatly stimulates the mining of silver?

Mr. FALL. The fact is that it does to some extent, yes; and but for the classification embraced in your bill it would stimulate it very much more. As a matter of fact, the protective tariff bills which you have been passing, the duties which you have been putting on lead under your schedule, have operated for the benefit of the American Smelting & Refining Co. and other smelting industries, rather than for the benefit of the American lead miner.

Mr. NORRIS. Probably a protective tariff on silver would work the same way. It seems to me, as far as the protective feature is concerned, that the Government has done a great deal for silver in the way of making purchases, and all the Governments have. If it were not for the fact that silver is purchased by all the civilized nations of the world, its value would not be one-tenth what it is now. It depends for its value now to a great extent upon the very fact that the Governments of the world have purchased it, and the same thing to a certain extent is true of shoes. Now, that is not my argument, but it can be deduced from those who favor this bill.

They say this ought to be done, that silver is different from wheat, because this Government purchases silver, and all Governments do. All Governments purchase shoes, and all Governments purchase flour, and flour is a product of wheat. It would not make any difference as to the benefit to the farmer who produces the wheat whether you bought the wheat or whether you bought the flour; it would be all the same in the end. If he was unable to ship his wheat abroad, and could not sell it on that account, and the Government should step in and buy 15,000,000 bushels and store it until it could be shipped, or use it for the purpose of feeding its vast armies and employees, the effect would be to increase the market price and to increase prosperity among those who produce the article. That is what you are asking for silver. You are making no other pretense about it.

The Senator from Colorado said, and I am not disputing but that he was correct—and, as I said a while ago, I am not going into a discussion of the demonetization of silver—that silver had been abused by legislation; that it had not been treated right by legislation.

If that is an argument, if that is the reason why we should favor it, then I repeat we ought to have the Government buy wheat. I do not think the farmer has been treated right in the production of wheat. The tariff bill took the tariff off of wheat and subjected him, practically, with certain limitations, to the markets of the world, where before he had been protected. Now, whether I am wrong or not may be a question open to dispute; but there are millions of men, and I am one of them, who believe that we did not treat the farmer right in the tariff bill in taking the tariff off of practically everything he produces. If, because we have not legislated fairly in regard to any product, we should now, because it is declining, go into the market and buy it, then we ought to go into the market and buy wheat; then we ought to buy barley; then we ought to buy a great many other things that are produced and are manufactured by different classes of the American people.

It all reduces itself to the simple proposition that we are asked here to do something that I believe is like trying to lift ourselves over the fence by pulling on our boot straps. We are going to buy a lot of silver now. Then we will not buy it after a while. We are going to use the excuse that we can not ship it abroad. Now, I think that is exaggerated a great deal. I believe matters are almost in a normal condition as far as shipping abroad is concerned; at least, if they are not, they will be to that condition shortly. It is only temporary; and I understand from statements made here on the floor of the Senate, and from articles appearing in the newspapers, that there are now hundreds of ships ready to accept any product to be shipped to a great portion, at least, of Europe. If the Bank of England wants silver, and we have the silver to sell, she will have no difficulty in getting all the ships she needs to carry it across the Atlantic Ocean. I do not think there is any question about that.

We have, it seems to me, become excited on this proposition without just cause, not only on this particular bill but on various other bills. Our products here being temporarily unable to get shipment to Europe would cause a decline in the market; that is true; but a great portion of Europe, including England and France, particularly England, must have our products. We can get along without selling them, but she can not get along without buying them. Her people will starve without them. As for this talk about not being able to ship across the ocean—that great Government will owe her very existence to the supplying of her people with the products we have for sale; and she will guarantee and insure, if it does not come about in some other method very shortly, the shipment of all products that are necessary for her people; and to a great extent what applies to her applies to the other nations of Europe.

So it does seem to me that in this case we are unduly excited. The silver miner, if he has been interfered with in the shipment of his product to Europe within the last two or three weeks, will soon have the avenues of commerce opened widely to him. It can not be otherwise; and what applies to silver mining applies to those who have the products of the farm and the factory everywhere for sale.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Why does the Senator confine his observations to those cases in which exports have been interfered with? If one of our citizens is injured in any way by the war, why should not his needs be considered?

Mr. NORRIS. There is no reason on earth why they should not be, just the same as any other class.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is nothing peculiar in the fact that he may not be able to export his product.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. If he is hurt in any other way he has just the same claim upon the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Absolutely; just as good a claim on the Government as an exporter.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, some time ago I invited the attention of the Senate to the peril of the diminishing production of gold in the world. The production in our country during 1913 fell off $11,000,000. Similar conditions prevail in the Rand, in which they are even more aggravated this year. Everyone familiar with the mining industry must recognize that that condition will be intensified and aggravated by the shutting down of the silver mines.

Reference was made in the debate this morning to the fact that the two metals are ordinarily found in association, and that to close down the silver mines will be still further to reduce the gold supply. Those who are wedded to the gold standard can not look at this situation without the greatest concern, because just as surely as the supply continues to diminish there will again arise, beyond doubt, an agitation for the restoration of silver as one of the money metals.

Accordingly, this is a matter of as grave concern to the advocates of the gold standard as to those who give their adherence to the bimetallic standard; and in the interest of our whole system of currency steps ought to be taken, if possible, to prevent the suspension of these silver mines.

I deem the matter of the diminishing gold supply as so important that I send to the desk and ask to have incorporated in the RECORD, without reading, a late communication which I have received from the secretary of the American Mining Congress, giving the statistics and making some valuable suggestions in connection with the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE AMERICAN MINING CONGRESS,
Washington, D. C., August 17, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,
Chairman Committee on Mines and Mining,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Will you permit me to call your attention to a situation which I believe calls for special activity on the part of the Federal Government, looking to the stimulation of gold production?

This country is in a period of decreasing gold production, last year's product being $11,000,000 less than the product of the year 1909. During these years the world's production so increased as to almost keep pace with growth in commercial transactions. Last year the world's gold production entered a period of decline, the decrease from the year 1912 amounting to $11,000,000. Nearly one-half of this shortage was created in the South African fields, in which the gold production has increased from $67,000,000 in 1903 to $209,000,000 in 1912.

The radical falling off in African production in 1913 was in part accounted for by labor troubles during the early part of the year, although it is probable that this condition could have been prevented had not the decreasing average of the ores handled made it impossible to meet the demands of labor. Notwithstanding the settlement of the labor trouble, the first seven months of 1914, as compared with the corresponding period of 1913, show a decrease in gold production in the Transvaal of more than $10,000,000.

The Transvaal Chamber of Mines a few months ago, at the request of the Government Economic Commission, prepared a statement concerning the future production of gold in South Africa, in which it was stated that the decrease of last year was largely because of the inability to secure capital to continue the development of the unexplored portions of the Rand.

The value of the Transvaal ores is fairly well established, but the increasing cost of operation has not been so offset by improved methods as to make gold mining an attractive investment. The Chamber of Mines predicts that the tonnage of rock which may be crushed in the Rand during each of the current five years may be increased to 28,000,000 tons, and that unless additional capital is secured the following 10 years will undoubtedly show a decrease to an average of 14,000,000 tons annually.

The present estimated annual tonnage of 28,000,000 is somewhat in excess of the average production during the last five years, although the production therefrom will be less because of the lower grade of the ore.

If the falling off of gold production in South Africa shall be as rapid as that of last year, and as outlined by the Transvaal Chamber of Mines, the world will need to look to some other source to maintain anything like the present ratio between its gold reserves and the greatly increasing business transactions and attending credits.

A corresponding decrease during the next 10 years, coupled with the average decrease now taking place elsewhere, would reduce the world's gold production more than one-half, while the probable increased demand for gold because of industrial expansion will require that this production shall be doubled in order to maintain the present status.

In the United States the production from the larger mining centers—Cripple Creek, Goldfield, Deadwood, Juneau, and the mines of California—have been the chief sources of production, while the smaller districts have in almost every instance registered a decrease in production.

In 1913 the Cripple Creek district increased its production over 1912 by approximately $173,000, while the State at large registered a decrease of about $300,000.

The present enormous movement of gold to Europe calls attention to the fact that since the year 1870 our gold exports have exceeded our gold imports by the enormous total of $836,700,893, approximately one-half of the stock of gold coin now in the United States.

Gold exported for commercial reasons may find its way back as the result of an increased exchange rate, but that which becomes a part of a governmental reserve will not return. Last year more than one-half of the world's supply of gold was absorbed in the governmental monetary reserves of five European countries.

During the fiscal year 1912–13 India absorbed $266,537,773 of the world's gold supply, or approximately 28 per cent. The amount of gold used in art and industry approximates 30 per cent of the total production.

With the advancement of the industrial civilization of the Orient there will be a continually increasing demand for gold, and the very cause of its export will make less likely its probable return.

During the last two years, for which an approximate record has been made, the world's industrial consumption of gold was as follows:

1911	$164,272,700
1912	154,000,000

These influences are continually at work without the special demands created by war conditions, which at this time threaten to absorb a large part of our gold reserves. Our debit to foreign nations now involved in war is more than $6,000,000,000. Our gold reserves are less than two billions. True the balance of trade will be in our favor; true our probable export of 100,000,000 bushels of wheat may bring us $2 per bushel instead of $1, but how far will a paltry $100,000,000 or $200,000,000 go toward paying a debt of $6,000,000,000; and how soon will the war-impoverished nations be required to call for the liquidation of all outstanding investments. The belief is justified that favorable trade balances will quite largely meet this situation, although there can be no question that the present conditions are increasing the strain upon gold.

The present world situation as affected by gold supply seems to justify and strengthen the continuing appeal of the American Mining Congress for adequate Federal aid in this behalf.

While general prosperity induces an increased production of other minerals, through the increase in price which an active demand stimulates, it is unique that increased prosperity in other lines makes more difficult the production of gold.

Increases in the cost of labor, machinery, and supplies add to the cost of gold production, while its value remains unchanged. The incentive for increased production of commodities can only operate to stimulate gold production when gold goes to a premium, which means depreciation of our currency. More economic mining and treatment methods are necessary if gold production is to be kept normal while other lines are prospering.

Comparatively few new bodies of high-grade gold ore have been discovered for many years past, while those previously discovered are rapidly becoming exhausted of their reserves. This is one of the chief reasons for the decrease in gold production. When these reserves are exhausted, the enormous capital, the great amount of engineering and metallurgical skill, and the labor which is now utilized in these mines will each be required to find employment elsewhere, unless in the meantime through some agency it is made economically possible to mine and treat at a profit the enormous bodies of low-grade ores which can not be economically treated at this time. The shifting of these enormous productive forces in itself would create a condition demanding governmental attention.

The world's strain upon gold is being rapidly increased. The world's gold production is decreasing. In the United States these conditions are being emphasized by the increasing demand for money resulting from our marvelous industrial development. To meet these conditions we must either produce gold ourselves or secure it through favorable trade balances from countries to some of which we are already greatly indebted. I believe that the very best we can hope from favorable trade balances will still leave a great necessity for an increased home production.

Let me epitomize my ideas on this subject:

(1) The need for gold to maintain a proper ratio between base and structure of credit is increasing with the great increase in our commerce.

(2) Increased costs of operation now and always will add to the burdens of gold production so long as our credit money is at par.

(3) The increased foreign demand for gold reserves is absorbing a great part of the world's production.

(4) The increased use of credit money, made possible by the new currency bill—that I may not be misunderstood, let me say that I consider this bill the most important, the most valuable, and that in effect it will be the most useful legislation of recent times—increases the burden upon an already overburdened gold supply by requiring it to support a greatly enlarged "superstructure of credit."

(5) The highly productive mines of the country are being rapidly exhausted and no comprehensive effort is being made to develop other mines to thereafter maintain continued production or to employ the labor, the skill, and the capital now so employed.

The importance of this subject was emphasized before the International Congress of Chambers of Commerce, recently held in Paris, by Mr. F. F. Begg, president of the London Chamber of Commerce. Mr. Begg advocated the internationalizing of the world's gold reserves through the establishment by the leading commercial nations of a joint metallic money reserve, to be available for the prevention of financial panics in any of the contributing countries.

Mr. Begg says: "It is on these stocks of gold that the enormous superstructure of credit, which is the leading feature of modern finance, rests. It is on the ebb and flow of these stocks of gold that the eyes of all business men are fixed, and as these stocks wax or wane at particular points, so credit, and consequently business under modern conditions, increases or decreases."

This plan anticipates a "first aid" to the financially injured, the necessity for which we should prevent by the development of our enormous low-grade gold resources. We should first do everything possible through scientific research and investigation, and should this fail we may well consider the importance and perhaps the necessity of offering a bounty for the product of low-grade refractory gold-bearing ores.

It must be remembered that any substantial increase in gold production must come as a result of years of development. Mines are made, not found. Substantial increase in production must come from the great bodies of low-grade refractory ores, the treatment of which to-day is practically impossible, because of the fact that much of the values are lost by present-day treatment methods.

The problems involved require the highest scientific investigation. Their solution will be of general advantage to the public as a whole, and are of such a character that the individual can not solve them for himself.

Results can hardly be expected, except as the result of long, tedious research. After the treatment problems find solution, years will be required to develop the ore bodies and build the necessary plants. This is not altogether a western problem. While it particularly concerns the industrial development of the West, its importance as a feeder to the exchange medium of commerce is of much greater concern to the financial centers of the Nation.

Purely from the standpoint of industrial development, this great Government can afford to lend a more helpful hand to her mining industry, for the same reasons that have induced her munificent and effective work in behalf of agriculture.

The Bureau of Mines has done some preliminary work in this behalf, but the appropriations thus far made for this branch of its work have been pitifully small and painfully inadequate. Surely this great Government can afford to make a better effort to stimulate the production of gold.

You will find attached production statistics to which reference is made.

Very sincerely, yours, J. F. CALLBREATH, Secretary.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, any student of public affairs must recognize the futility of opposing a measure intended for the benefit of a locality or a part of the country. The concentrated effort of a few who dwell in several States is far and away more potent when exerted for favorable legislation on their behalf than is a proper regard for the welfare of the whole people; and thus, more and more, citizens having business or other interests are coming here to Washington for the sake of obtaining special privileges. There is nothing in sight on the political horizon quite so demoralizing as this dispostion to put forward legislation which benefits a particular class or section of the Nation. Those who are to be benefited are insistent and eager, and any legislator who opposes them incurs hostility and obloquy very difficult to bear.

I do not believe the passage of this measure will have any special effect one way or the other. It does not involve any very great expenditure, but as a matter of principle I am constrained to stand here and oppose it. If, to aid the silver-mining interests, we are to buy a certain number of ounces of silver, why not help every other trade or industry in a time of depression?

The Government is a constructor of large buildings. It uses a great deal of building material. Why not buy structural steel and cement to help out where men are leaving their employment or whose profits are being reduced to a minimum?

The Senator from Nebraska anticipated one of the illustrations I intended to use. The Government, for its Army, buys large quantities of shoes. The shoe industry is depressed just now. Therefore, why not buy shoes?

Our soldiers wear clothes. Why not buy clothing to aid that industry? In these troublous times no doubt many other industries must suffer. Shall a paternal Government aid them all?

Mr. President, we have enough of these special privileges already. I have been glad to stand here, as I did in the House for years, against a storm of criticism, to oppose ship subsidy; but I am compelled to recognize that much of our legislation is permeated by subsidies. A certain class of publishers can send through the mails enormous quantities of literature at great expense to the Government, and we are prevented from reducing letter postage to 1 cent, and thereby conferring a boon on every letter writer in the country, by the fact that such a deficiency is created in handling second-class mail matter. The efficiency of a Representative or Senator is now more and more coming to be gauged, not by what he does for the whole country, but by what he does for his State or his district or for some particular element in our population.

Mr. President, it is time to call a halt; and I think this measure furnishes a place where the Congress should assert its disposition to avoid special favors to any interest or locality, and declare its intention to legislate only for the general weal. If there is any business or commercial interest in the country that has been favored, it is producers or miners of silver.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. Silver as a money metal was destroyed by national legislation in the interest of the creditor and bondholding classes of the country. Does not the Senator from Ohio think that under the circumstances we are entitled to a little assistance right now, where we are not introducing any innovation at all, but simply asking the Government to make purchases within the next six months which it would make anyway within the next two years?

Mr. BURTON. I can not at all agree with my friend the Senator from Colorado, with whom I am in accord in most things, that silver as a money metal was destroyed by the bondholders. Silver as a money entitled to unlimited coinage was destroyed by the logic of events, by inevitable tendencies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I kindly ask the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] if he will not temporarily lay the bill aside?

Mr. CULBERSON. I will be very glad to accommodate the Senator, but before doing that I should like to ask how long the bill which has been before the Senate will probably occupy the time of the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. I know of but one or two other Senators who desire to speak. I do not think it will be very many minutes before we are through with it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. THOMAS. I will promise not to consume any more time, except to make one more interruption.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly; and I shall speak but a little while.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside.

POSTAL SAVINGS SYSTEM.

Mr. BRYAN submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 4, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 2, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert, in lieu of the words "but the balance to the credit of any person, exclusive of accumulated interest, shall not exceed $1,000," the following: "but the balance to the credit of any person, upon which interest is payable, shall not exceed $500, exclusive of accumulated interest"; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert, in lieu of the words "Provided, That no interest shall be paid on such part of the balance to the credit of any person as is in excess of $500," the following: "Provided, That the board of trustees may, in their discretion, and under such regulations as such board may promulgate, accept additional deposits, not to exceed in the aggregate $500 for each depositor, but upon which no interest shall be paid"; and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN H. BANKHEAD,
N. P. BRYAN,
JOSEPH L. BRISTOW,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN A. MOON,
S. W. SMITH,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BRYAN. I ask that the conference report be adopted.

Mr. BURTON. Were the Senate amendments adopted by the conference?

Mr. BRYAN. The Senate adopted an amendment providing that the maximum amount should be $1,000 and that interest should be paid on one-half that sum. Substantially that was agreed to by the conference. The only change made was to allow the board of trustees which administer the postal-savings fund to pay interest on one-half and keep as a separate fund that upon which they pay no interest.

Mr. BURTON. As a matter of accounting?

Mr. BRYAN. As a matter of accounting.

Mr. BURTON. Thus if a man deposits a thousand dollars under the Senate provision that would have remained as one deposit, but he would receive interest on but $50.

Mr. BRYAN. That is right.

Mr. BURTON. Under the provision as agreed upon that deposit of $1,000 is in two parts, one of which pays interest and the other does not.

Mr. BRYAN. That is right. Section 2 was agreed to exactly as it passed the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

PURCHASE OF SILVER BULLION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6261) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase not to exceed 15,000,000 ounces of silver bullion, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think that I said silver was demonetized by the bondholders of the country. What I said was that silver had been demonetized by a law in the interest of the bond holding and purchasing class.

The logic of events which led up to those conditions was, of course, first, the Franco-Prussian War, to which I referred this morning, and the necessity or the opportunity on the part of Germany to practically double the amount of indemnity burdened upon France, followed by legislation which would vastly increase the outstanding public and private credits of the world by cutting in two the basis on which they rested.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, again I am unable to agree with the Senator from Colorado. It seems to me it is a conclusive fact that it was not the creditor or bond-holding class that brought about the demonetization of silver; because at the time of our demonetization act, in 1873, and during the discussions preceding it in this and in the other House, the intrinsic value of a silver dollar was greater than that of a gold dollar. The decrease in the relative value of silver, which it is claimed operated to the disadvantage of the debtor, did not come until after the passage of the demonetization act and was for the most part traceable to entirely different causes.

What caused the demonetization of silver? Mr. President, it was the realization that with improvements in commerce and transportation and the close figuring in the markets, a condition developed under which when the intrinsic value of the metal in one dollar was greater than that in the other even by 1 per cent the less valuable prevailed in the monetary circulation and the more valuable went out of use. Silver and gold are commodities used in the arts, and of values quoted in the markets of the world. When the daily market quotations showed marked and increasing variations from the former comparative prices, we heard the death knell of bimetallism. It became apparent that the idea of tying together two metals of different intrinsic values and seeking to coin them on the same ratio of 16 to 1, or any fixed ratio, was a chimera. Thus bimetallism was abandoned by the leading nations of the earth.

I can find no other principal reason for the abandonment of bimetallism. All other causes were but partial and incident to it. When in 1878, on the 28th of February, Congress passed the act providing for the purchase of not less than $2,000,000 nor more than $4,000,000 worth of silver bullion per month to be coined into silver dollars of 412½ grains, making of them legal tender, the Treasury Department in the execution of that law, I believe, usually purchased the minimum, about $2,000,000 worth of bullion per month. Instead of raising the price of silver, it continued to fall. Silver mines were being opened all over the world—the Comstock was perhaps the beginner—and silver continued to fall in comparison with gold.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. I am sure the Senator will recall that that was not a measure proposed except as a compromise for unlimited bimetallism.

Mr. BURTON. For free and unlimited coinage. It was a compromise, of course.

Mr. THOMAS. It was purely a measure which was offered and finally adopted through the agency of those who were opposed to bimetallism. Its operation was predicted by men like Senator Teller and Senator Jones, of Nevada, upon the floor of the Senate, and it turned out precisely as they predicted, and it proved to be one of the worst possible measures that could have been enacted in the interest of bimetallism.

Mr. BURTON. At the same time it greatly increased the demand for silver.

Again, in 1890, it was said we must do something for silver. Silver as a commodity was like a typical dependent person in a community. Frequently such persons are better able to take care of themselves than, at least, the general average of the community, but for some unaccountable reason everybody is saying, "We must do something for So-and-so." This dependence is hurtful rather than helpful. In 1900 the law was passed providing for the purchase of 4,500,000 ounces per month, an amount almost exactly as great as all the silver production in the United States at that time, and the issuance of money against that according to the bullion value. The price was increased for a year or two, but that conferred no benefit. This was the history of all these efforts. Then we had regulations by which silver dollars were to be transferred from a Subtreasury to another place, in order to stimulate their circulation, and a multitude of similar regulations.

So I have come to believe that the fall of silver or the condition of that industry will not be greatly influenced by legislation, and I feel like raising my voice, with the utmost friendliness to those engaged in this and every other form of mining industry, against a law of this nature.

The Secretary of the Treasury has the right, if there is any deficiency in the quantity of subsidiary silver, to buy all he needs. This bill will not help in giving us a copious circulation. We do not need this legislation. It is merely a provision by which we shall anticipate the demands of the future and buy 15,000,000 ounces, costing perhaps about $7,800,000.

I pass by briefly the arguments which go to show that this will not do any good. Past experience will show that such legislation has not benefited silver mining. If you buy this total quantity and suspend silver purchases in the future, after a temporary stimulus the chances are that there may be an even worse depression in this industry.

But there is a more important question involved than the financial effect of this legislation.

Mr. President, can we not come to this higher ideal, that the American citizen, the American business man, all those engaged in the various activities and industries of American life, must depend upon themselves?

I do not think the tariff is an exception to that rule or ideal, because it throws the door wide open to the great multitude. It is an expression of an American or national policy to create an industrial empire within our own borders in order that we should be self-supporting; but even so, we ought to reduce tariff rates gradually, not, in my judgment, as hastily as in the bill of last year. Again, whenever monopoly results, whenever undue privileges are enjoyed by reason of it, I say, for one, that the tariff upon the commodity in question should be abolished.

We shall gain our greatest excellence in the economic life of the nations if, as far as possible, we give free play to those engaged in enterprise. Let us not subject them to hampering or arbitrary regulations, but at the same time say to them, You must take care of yourselves and work out your own destiny. The American citizen is ready to respond to that appeal and take a foremost place in all the industries and commerce of the world without special privileges, without the necessity of coming here to Washington to obtain some particular favor.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I am not proposing to take up much of the time of the Senate. I shall not go into a general theoretical discussion of the crime of 1873 or an economic discussion of the demonetization of silver and its causes and effects. I do not think that either argument, with due deference, has any application to the question at issue here. Neither do I think there is any analogy in the proposition submitted. I presume with sincerity, possibly with not very much thought, by some of the Senators with reference to the purchase of wheat and the purchase of shoes. The policy of the United States Government has not so far been to make wheat a legal tender even in the nature of a limited legal tender in amounts of $5 or less. Neither has the policy been to make shoes a portion of the circulating medium of the country as yet. The policy of the Government has been to coin silver into subsidiary coinage and to use it. The demand comes from the people themselves who want silver for a subsidiary coinage.

The policy of the Government is to purchase now approximately 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 ounces of silver annually and to coin it and circulate it as a subsidiary coinage of this country. This is the policy already established. This bill does not seek in any way to interfere with that policy, but simply allows the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, to anticipate the annual purchase which he would make within the next six months if he desires to do so to the extent of 15,000,000 ounces. That is all under heaven there is to it. It is not an attempt to change the policy; it is following the policy established years and years ago and still continued.

I know whenever the word "silver" is uttered in the United States Congress there are some Senators who think highly of the products of their own localities, but when they are speaking about silver they ask us to lose sight of the fact that they think so highly of steel, for example—the manufacture of steel; structural steel—that I presume they would vote to possibly make it a legal tender. At any rate they would undoubtedly vote to protect it, as they have done in the past at the expense of all the citizens of the country. This has been the policy of gentlemen who now, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], for instance, appeal to us not to represent a special interest, that an interest which has produced over $5,000,000,000 of actual accumulated wealth shall not receive one moment of consideration at the hands of those who have asked for protection to the extent of almost as many billions from the people of the United States for the local industries situated within their own State. It is to me, Mr. President, rather a peculiar argument I admit.

As to the exact conditions, not only has the demand for silver decreased but the cost of producing silver as a manufactured product has increased. You do not get the coin and silver out of the bowels of the earth, nor do you get from the earth the bullion with which you make the silver. If you believe in protecting the manufactures of the United States, then extend your protective theory to silver as well as to iron ore and steel. Silver is the manufactured product of silver ore as steel is the manufactured product of iron ore.

But, Mr. President, silver is being produced to-day from ores which would not produce it a few years ago, and gold is being produced to-day from ores which would not produce it. It has been said here by several of the western Senators that silver and gold go along together. That is absolutely true in a great many instances. In by far the larger number of cases where the silver ores are gold bearing the silver metal predominates over the gold.

This is the condition we are confronting, and it is why the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is supported by the West in asking for the passage of this bill. The miner, the small producer, carrying his carload of ore to the smelter or to the market, where he does not control capital enough to erect his own smelter, has been settled with upon the basis of the silver, lead, and copper contents of those ores. He has been settled with until recently on the basis of 53 cents for his silver, or 3.90 for his lead and 13 to 14½ for his copper. At present he is being settled with on the basis of 10 cents for copper, 25 cents for silver, and nothing for his lead, and both the cost of the production of silver and the cost of the production of gold has gone up within the last two or three months, and particularly since the German shipping has been wiped from the seas.

To-day by far the largest amount of bullion produced by individuals or by miners, aside from that produced through the great Smelting Trust, is produced by the cyanide of potassium process. Germany is the great cyanide of potassium producer. Deposits of cyanide of potassium have not been found in commercial quantities to any extent in any other country of the world.

The cost of cyanide of potassium is increasing day by day and has gone up with leaps and bounds. The cost of producing silver and the cost of producing gold, the cost of producing ores and of putting them in shape to be used to the man who is not a member of the Smelting Trust, has increased, and he is now settling on the basis of 25 cents for his ores of silver instead of 53 cents.

What is the consequence? In my State we are selfish. The Senator from Ohio appeals to us not to be selfish, but I know that the steel and iron people of Ohio have never made that appeal when their interests were at stake. We are selfish, and I admit it. In one county within the last 30 days 1,000 men, 50 per cent of the miners earning daily wages, have been discharged and the wages of the balance cut 10 per cent. In the great mining camp of Mogollon, on the line between Arizona and Mexico, in New Mexico, largely one of the greatest gold producers in the entire southwest, where gold formerly averaged about one-third the value and silver two-thirds, within the next 30 days, unless relief is furnished in some way, not only the whole product will be shut off and this multiplied wealth that goes out to the people, but thousands of miners will be turned loose without any opportunity to earn a living in that occupation. You are cutting them off entirely from their occupation, and they are asking a little measure of relief not to cost you one cent, simply to anticipate the purchase for the emergency now of that which you would purchase and pay for at any rate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendment the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. WEEKS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Hollis	Pittman	Swanson
Burton	James	Poindexter	Thomas
Camden	Lane	Ransdell	Thompson
Chilton	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	Walsh
Culberson	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	Weeks
Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Shields	West
Fall	Myers	Simmons	White
Fletcher	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Gore	Overman	Smith, Md.
Gronna	Perkins	Smoot

Mr. WHITE. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] and to state that he is paired. This announcement will stand for the day.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. THORNTON]. I wish this announcement to stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. BRISTOW, Mr. CUMMINS, Mr. HUGHES, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. STERLING answered to their names when called.

Mr. KERN, Mr. OWEN, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. BRYAN, and Mr. WILLIAMS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] is absent on account of illness in his family.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire again to announce, and to let the announcement stand for the day, that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] has been called from the city on business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate long; but I see from the statement of the Treasury Department issued August 20 that we now have subsidiary silver coins aggregating $21,790,264.66 and that we have silver bullion available for coinage to the amount of $3,683,698.23. It is not proposed to coin this additional silver so as to put it in circulation, but to store it in warehouses. To me it seems surprising that we should draw on the Government to purchase the product of mining companies because the price of that product is low, unless we propose to treat other industries in the same way. Why we should discriminate in favor of one industry against another, to my mind, is beyond comprehension.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Kansas recognize that the mere making of silver a money metal takes it out of the class of the ordinary commodity? Every nation in the world buys silver; every nation in the world will continue to buy silver. Does not the Senator recognize that the Government has an interest in not permitting silver to get too low, for this reason: Suppose it were to get to 1 cent an ounce, the counterfeiting of silver would be unlimited. Therefore silver dollars would cease to be a circulating medium. Consequently, the Government has a certain interest as to silver which does not attach to other commodities.

Mr. BRISTOW. I think the Senator from Colorado is entirely mistaken about counterfeiting. If silver were not of any value, there would be no occasion to counterfeit it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If a man could make a silver dollar out of 1 cent's worth of silver, the Senator can readily see that many people would go into the counterfeiting business, and it would be almost impossible to detect the fact that the coin was a counterfeit.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, as I have said, it is not proposed to coin any more silver than would be coined in the normal operations of the Treasury Department. It is proposed to buy it and store it. Within 60 days the farmers of Kansas have sold millions of bushels of wheat for 60 cents a bushel. There is no more occasion for the Senators from the silver-mining States coming here now and asking the Government to buy silver in order to stimulate and to keep up the price of their product than there would have been for the farmers of Kansas and Nebraska 60 days ago to ask the Government to buy 10,000,000, 15,000,000, or 20,000,000 bushels of wheat in order that they might obtain a better price for their grain. It is true that wheat has gone up, and is now selling for from 75 to 80 cents a bushel where six weeks ago it sold for 60 cents a bushel.

If it is to be the policy of the Government when there are dull times in any industry to come in and purchase a quantity of the product of such industry in order to help that business, that is one proposition which we might consider; but when you undertake to single out silver mining alone and silver miners only I must object. These men are no more deserving than are the men who grow the wheat of this country. They can take care of themselves a great deal better than the farmers can take care of themselves when times are dull.

When cattle a few years ago were selling for from $15 to $25 a head and first-class horses from $40 to $60 a head was anybody proposing to appropriate money by the Government to buy horses and cattle to make them worth more, and to let the Government hold them until the price went up? Oh, no; it was not proposed to pursue that policy then; but now, because some silver miners are interested, it is proposed to draw on the Treasury of the people of the United States in order to help their business direct. The surprising thing to me is, that it is proposed to be done by men who stand here and in the most vociferous way denounce all kinds of special privilege. It depends a good deal on who is to profit by the privilege. The same Congress that passes a law that will destroy beet-sugar factories which are giving employment to thousands of men will turn around within a little over a year and propose to use the Treasury to buy the product of a mining company in order that that company may not lose money in its operations.

I think the bill is indefensible from any point of view, unless you are going to put the Government into regulating prices in trade by the stimulating of every industry when dull times prevail by purchasing the product. I did not want this bill to come to a vote without expressing my views as emphatically as I can against this discrimination.

It is not proposed, as I say, to coin this silver into money that the people may use it, but it is proposed to buy it and store it. A few years ago when farmers' organizations were asking that the Government erect warehouses in which to store their wheat when prices were down we heard those men denounced from one end of this country to the other as wild fanatics. This is exactly the same proposition, except that you are going to take the product of the silver mines instead of the product of the farm and store it until the price goes up.

There is just as much reason for buying wheat. The Government can use it; the Government can thereby help a great many worthy people. Such action would have saved the farmers in the Middle West millions this year. Last year they lost all their crop by drought, and this year their enormous crop was dumped on a market that was lower than it had been for years. They could not hold their wheat. Their debts were pressing them; their notes in bank were due, and they had to meet them; but no consideration was had for them. Oh, no. If some of us here representing that constituency had proposed that the Government buy the wheat, we would have been laughed out of the Chamber. Now, however, when silver miners are concerned, it is proposed that the Government shall help them to make a profit. I want to protest against this legislation as vigorously as I know how.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is not to subsidize the miners of the country but to steady the price of silver and, at the same time, to avail ourselves of the opportunity of securing silver bullion, which will be necessary in the future for subsidiary coin at the low price now prevailing. This low price has been occasioned by a dislocation in the transportation of the world, a dislocation which has thrown upon this country the absorption of the product of our silver mines, which has heretofore had a very wide market. The question before us is whether or not the policy of stabilizing the price of silver by enabling the Government to purchase the silver for monetary use at a low price serves such a public purpose as should be sustained by congressional legislation.

Mr. President, I do not propose to go into all of the intricacies of the money question, but I do wish to present in a few words the monetary situation of the world. In 1873 the movement for the demonetization of silver among the principal countries of the world culminated. The claim was made at that time that gold was the only stable measure of value; that the largely increased production of silver lessened the value of that metal as a money metal, and that the stable production of gold insured it as a stable standard of value. How futile events have proved that reasoning to be.

The world starved for the want of money from 1873 until 1896, during which period the production of gold did not materially increase, whilst the increased production of silver was largely unutilized for money. Then an increase in the production of gold took place, as a result of which the world had in 1913 an annual production 300 per cent greater than the production of 1893. During that period the production of silver has increased only 30 per cent, proving that, so far as production is concerned, silver is a more stable metal than gold itself.

During this time we have not as yet found enough metallic money to satisfy the demands of the world for money, and there are in South America a thousand million dollars of paper money with almost no metal backing it, and we have in this country in our greenbacks and in our national-bank notes about a billion dollars more of uncovered paper money.

During this period for many years we have been utilizing silver simply for subsidiary coinage purposes. We have not enough subsidiary silver in the country. We should open a larger market for subsidiary silver by doing away with the issuance of $1 notes, $2 notes, and $5 notes and confining the issue of notes to the large denominations, as they do in England. Yet, notwithstanding that we have hardly sufficient subsidiary silver to meet the requirements of the country, in the West we find silver everywhere used in the small coinage, while in the East we find $1 and $2 bills used where silver ought to be used.

Therefore, without remonetizing silver, without reestablishing it as a part of a bimetallic standard of value, without opening the mints to silver for free and unlimited coinage, the production of silver has for 20 years been almost uniform year after year. It has maintained a comparatively stable price—somewhere about 55 cents an ounce—notwithstanding its general monetary use has been destroyed.

Now, here comes this dislocation in the transportation of the world, because of which the silver production of this country requires absorption by this country or else not only silver mining will diminish but also gold mining, for both of these metals are produced at the same time from the same mines, and if you diminish the value of one in the markets you diminish the value of the ore which contains both, and you diminish the number of producing mines in the country.

Now, Mr. President, as a result of the war now going on, you will find probably that large amounts of uncovered paper money will gradually be issued, and that the time will come when that paper will have to be covered by either gold or silver, or both, and that there will be a demand for both these metals, either upon a parity at a certain ratio or through a limited coinage, for the purpose of backing the uncovered paper money of the world, or by methods granting free and unlimited coinage to the one and limited coinage as subsidiary money to the other.

There is, therefore, no risk whatever in the suggestion that the United States should come to the front and accomplish the great public purpose of obtaining at a low price sufficient bullion for the subsidiary money requirements of the country and at the same time so stabilizing the price as to prevent the dislocation of an industry which will diminish the production of both gold and silver. It seems to me that there can be no objection to this bill and that it ought to be passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAPP in the chair). The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BRISTOW. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and vote "yea."

Mr. GORE (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and vote "yea."

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], and therefore withhold my vote. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. STONE] is necessarily absent and has been expressly excused from attendance by vote of the Senate. In his absence he is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], which I transfer to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY], and vote "yea."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CULBERSON. Transfering my pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Transfering my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], who has not voted, as I understand, I vote "yea."

Mr. POMERENE. I am requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. He is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. GRONNA. I inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed he has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a general pair with that Senator. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. REED. The conditions of my pair are that when it is necessary to vote to make a quorum I can do so. I therefore will take the liberty of voting. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT. I am requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]; the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN]; the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]; and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the affirmative). I made a transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] for the purpose of voting. Since then the Senator from Florida has come into the Chamber and voted. I still have the right to vote if it is necessary to make a quorum, and if my vote is needed to make a quorum I wish it to stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that it is not necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 11, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase not to exceed 15,000,000 ounces of silver bullion, and for other purposes."

COTTON WAREHOUSES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the trust bill was temporarily laid aside to take up the bill just disposed of. I wish to ask the Senator from Texas if he will not consent to have the bill further temporarily laid aside, in order that we may take up Senate bill 6266, to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license cotton warehouses, and for other purposes. I do not think it will take any considerable length of time.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I take it that request refers exclusively and only to that bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Exclusively.

Mr. BURTON. And the request is not for a general laying aside of the unfinished business?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all; no.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, in view of the emergency measure suggested by the Senator from Georgia, I ask unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, unless objection is made. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BURTON. I again would like to understand: There is no question that the unfinished business is laid aside for the cotton-warehouse bill only?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have already explained to the Senate the nature of this bill, and unless some Senator wishes me to do so I do not desire to discuss it further. It is a very simple measure. It permits certain cotton warehouses——

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. NELSON. Is the bill before the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. A motion to take it up has not been made and acted upon, nor has unanimous consent been granted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, I thought unanimous consent was given.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not up to this time. If the bill is before the Senate, it is because it has been placed before the Senate heretofore.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I move that we take up Senate bill 6266.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia that I am not opposed to his bill because of the conditions in the cotton country, but if it is proposed to add to it an amendment relating to the grading and inspection of wheat and other small grains I am utterly opposed to it and shall have to oppose the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia and also the Senator from Texas, at least in the form of a suggestion, to the fact that to lay this bill before the Senate now on a motion would probably displace the unfinished business. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I have already obtained unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair simply makes that suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood that the Senator from Texas asked unanimous consent simply to temporarily lay aside the trust bill, which was done. That being done, I asked that the cotton-warehouse bill be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the form of a motion?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I really thought the unanimous consent carried with it consent to take up this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not think so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 6266.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I shall make no objection if it is understood that there is no grain inspection or wheat inspection attached to the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope there will be no effort to have it done. I have no arrangement to attach it, and I hope no effort will be made to do it.

Mr. NELSON. I recognize the fact that conditions are different in the cotton country. You have no cotton warehouses. We have an abundance of grain warehouses in our country, and we do not want to complicate it with any legislation of that kind.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the further difference exists that all the representatives from the cotton States agree on this bill, while the Senators from the grain States disagree. If the Senators from the grain States all agreed upon something they wished to ask, I should be glad to accept it; but with the Senators from the grain States disagreeing about it, I hope there will be no effort to add that measure to this one.

Mr. NELSON. I withdraw all objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 6266) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license cotton warehouses, and for other purposes.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That this act shall be known by the short title of "United States cotton warehouse act."

SEC. 2. That the term warehouse as used in this act shall be deemed to mean every building, compress, ginhouse, and other structure in which any cotton is, or may be, stored or held for, or in the course of, interstate or foreign commerce.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate the storage, warehousing, and certification of cotton; upon application to him, to inspect warehouses or cause them to be inspected; at any time, with or without application to him, to inspect, or cause to be inspected, all warehouses licensed under this act; to determine whether warehouses for which licenses are applied for, or have been issued, under this act are suitable for the proper storage or holding of cotton; to classify warehouses in accordance with their location, surroundings, capacity, condition, and other qualities, and the kinds of licenses issued, or that may be issued, to them pursuant to this act; and to prescribe the duties of warehouses licensed under this act with respect to the care of cotton stored or held therein.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, upon application to him by the owner or operator of a warehouse, to issue a license for the conduct of the same, subject to this act and such rules and regulations as may be made hereunder. Each license shall specify the date upon which it is to terminate, and, upon showing satisfactory to the Secretary of Agriculture, may, from time to time, be renewed, or extended, by a written instrument which shall specify the date of its termination.

SEC. 5. That applications may be made to the Secretary of Agriculture by the owner or operator of any warehouse licensed under this act for permission to designate the same as bonded under this act. No warehouse shall be so designated, and no name or description, conveying the impression that it is so bonded, shall be used, until a bond, with such penalty, containing such conditions and with such security as the Secretary of Agriculture may require, shall have been given, and he shall have approved the same, nor unless the approval by the Secretary of such bond remains uncanceled and in full force and effect. Any person owning cotton stored in a warehouse bonded under this act, or owning a receipt for cotton therein issued under this act, shall be entitled, in an action upon the bond, brought in any court of the United States having jurisdiction of the same, to recover all damages he may have sustained in respect to such cotton or receipt by reason of either the negligence or the misconduct of the owner or operator of the warehouse, or of his agents or servants.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of Agriculture may, upon presentation to him of satisfactory proof of competency, issue to any person a license to grade or classify cotton, and to certificate the grade or class thereof, under such rules and regulations as may be made pursuant to this act.

SEC. 7. That for all cotton stored or held by a warehouse licensed under this act original receipts, serially numbered, shall be issued by the owner or operator thereof, signed by himself or by his duly authorized agent. No such receipt shall be issued except for cotton actually stored or held in the warehouse at the time of the issuance thereof. No duplicate or copy of an original receipt shall be issued unless the same be plainly and conspicuously marked "duplicate" or "copy," as the case may be, upon the face thereof. While an original receipt, or any duplicate or copy thereof, issued under this act is outstanding, and uncanceled by the owner or operator of the warehouse issuing the same, no other or further receipt shall be issued for the cotton, except that in the case of lost or destroyed receipts new receipts may be issued upon the giving of satisfactory security in compliance with the rules and regulations made pursuant to this act. Any receipt issued in lieu of an original shall be upon the same terms and subject to such conditions as are prescribed by this act for such original receipt. Each original receipt shall include a true statement of the date and place of its issuance, its serial number, the location of the warehouse in which the cotton is stored or held, the weight of the cotton at the time of the issuance of the receipt, a description of the bales or packages by marks, numbers, or other means of identification, the amount or rate of storage charges, if any, which have accrued or are to accrue within six months from the date of issuance of the receipt, and constitute a lien on the cotton which has not been waived by the warehouseman, and when payable, and the amount and period of insurance, if any, on the cotton. Each such receipt shall include statements that it is issued subject to this act and that no other receipt for the cotton described therein or any part thereof is outstanding and, in addition to complying with this section, shall contain such terms and conditions, not inconsistent with the laws of the respective States in which issued, as the Secretary of Agriculture may require for carrying out the purposes of this act. Receipts may run to bearer, or to a specified holder, or to a specified holder or his assigns. The owner of an original receipt issued pursuant to this act shall be entitled, upon presentation thereof, to receive the identical cotton described therein.

SEC. 8. That each warehouse licensed under this act, whether bonded or not, shall keep correct records of all cotton stored or held therein and withdrawn therefrom, of all original warehouse receipts, and the duplicates or copies of the same, issued by the owner or operator of the warehouse, and of the receipts returned to and canceled by the owner or operator thereof, shall make reports to the Secretary of Agriculture, in such form and at such times as he may require, and shall be conducted and operated in all other respects in compliance with this act and the rules and regulations made hereunder.

SEC. 9. That any warehouse receipt or certificate of the grade or class of cotton issued under this act may specify the grade or class of the cotton covered thereby in accordance with the official cotton standards of the United States, as the same may be fixed and promulgated under authority of law from time to time by the Secretary of Agriculture, or in accordance with any other standard. If such receipts and certificates state the grade or class, they shall show the standard in accordance with which the cotton has been graded or classified.

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cause inspections and examinations to be made of any cotton which, in any warehouse receipt or certificate issued pursuant to this act, has been certified or represented to conform to any grade or class established in the official cotton standards of the United States and to ascertain whether the cotton is in fact of the specified grade or class. Whenever, after opportunity for hearing has been afforded to the owner of the cotton involved and the licensee concerned, it is determined by the Secretary that any such cotton has been incorrectly certified or represented to conform to a specified grade or class of the official cotton standards of the United States, he may publish his findings.

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of Agriculture may suspend or revoke any license issued, and may cancel his approval of any bond given, under this act for any violation of, or failure to comply with, any provision of this act or of the rules and regulations made hereunder. Any license may be suspended or revoked, after opportunity for hearing has been afforded to the licensee concerned, upon the ground that unreasonable or exorbitant charges have been made for services rendered.

SEC. 12. That the Secretary of Agriculture from time to time shall publish the results of investigations made under this act, the names and locations of warehouses licensed and bonded, and the names and addresses of persons licensed under this act, and lists of all licenses suspended or revoked, and of all bonds canceled hereunder.

SEC. 13. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, through officials, employees, or agents of the Department of Agriculture designated by him, to examine all books, records, papers, and accounts of warehouses licensed under this act, and of the owners or operators of such warehouses relating thereto.

SEC. 14. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall from time to time make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the efficient execution of the provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, available until expended, for the expenses of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, including the payment of such rent and the employment of such persons and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere. He is authorized, in his discretion, to call upon qualified persons not regularly in the service of the United States for temporary assistance in carrying out the purposes of this act and out of the moneys appropriated by this act to pay the salaries and expenses thereof.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, situated very much the same as cotton are the industries peculiar to the section of the country where cotton is grown, of tobacco and naval stores. After consultation with a number of Senators particularly concerned in tobacco, I offer this amendment:

I move to insert a new section between sections 14 and 15, which would read:

That all the provisions of this act are hereby extended to include warehouses for the storage of tobacco and naval stores, together with inspection, classification, and issuance of receipts and certificates, to the same extent, so far as applicable, as the same are specifically made applicable to warehouses for the storage and classification of cotton, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert between sections 14 and 15 the following, as section 15:

That all the provisions of this act are hereby extended to include warehouses for the storage of tobacco and naval stores, together with inspection, classification, and issuance of receipts and certificates, to the same extent, so far as applicable, as the same are specifically made applicable to warehouses for the storage and classification of cotton, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is also proposed to renumber section 15 as section 16.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be done, without objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Georgia before the bill passes from the Committee of the Whole. How many additional Government employees will the bill probably authorize?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The limit of the appropriation is $50,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. That, of course, is only for a limited time. How many Government employees will be required in operating the bill for the inspection of cotton and the other work that is incident to it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think the plan of the Secretary of Agriculture is simply to examine men as to their fitness to inspect cotton and to license men to do the work as cotton inspectors, not as Government officials. The pay for their work would not come from the Government. The cotton graders get their pay from the men whose cotton is graded, as a rule, or from the warehouses. I do not think the number will be very great. It is in a measure a new piece of work, and I am unable to say.

Mr. CUMMINS. I assume that there will have to be enough men appointed, outside of the office work, to inspect and grade nearly all the cotton in the country.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The view of the Secretary of Agriculture was that they would not be Government employees, but licensed inspectors or men not paid by the Government.

Mr. CUMMINS. Would it be the policy of the Government that they should act without any supervision of the Government over them?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There would be some supervision over them, of course; but the force in full would not be Government employees.

Mr. CUMMINS. How are they to be appointed—under the civil-service rules or otherwise?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The entire provision is subject to rules and regulations determined upon by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Georgia understands that that gives to the Secretary of Agriculture authority to appoint whatever number of employees may be appointed without recognizing the civil-service law. I assume that that is so, for I have looked in vain for anything to cover that subject.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think it would be entirely impossible to make the selections through the civil service for the work of the next 60 days, and the next 90 days is the most important part of the work.

The Market Division of the Agricultural Department has a force of civil-service men, and I know that it is the purpose of the Secretary of Agriculture to do this work as far as possible through the Market Division, already organized.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is there any provision in the bill with regard to the pay of the employees?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

Mr. CUMMINS. How does the Senator from Georgia expect they will be paid?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Part of them will be paid from the $50,000 appropriated to carry out this work. That is the only way in which they will be paid by the Government. Part of the work will be done by the Division of Markets. It is in line with the work now being done by the Division of Markets. Indeed, they have cotton graders already. Wherever the cotton graders now engaged in that work can do the work, they, of course, will do so.

Mr. CUMMINS. Are the cotton graders who are provided for employees of the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; and they are employed under the civil-service rules.

Mr. CUMMINS. They will be paid by the United States?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is there any provision here that the warehousemen shall bear the expense of the inspection and grading?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; but the limited appropriation leaves the bulk of the work necessarily to be borne by them.

Mr. CUMMINS. It seemed to me the bill was rather inadequate in that respect. I do not offer an amendment to it, because it would involve rewriting the bill; but I think we are opening up the way to the appointment of an indefinite number of employees at indefinite salaries, with no provision whatever as to their compensation. I assume that under the section which gives to the Secretary the right to prescribe rules and regulations in the execution of the bill he can determine whatever salaries he thinks ought to be paid.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. He certainly will not be allowed to fix any salaries beyond the appropriation, and he must administer the entire work under the appropriation. I know that the view of the Secretary is, and, asking for this appropriation, the view of the head of the Division of Markets was, that the bulk of the expense, practically all of the expense, would fall on the warehousemen and the owners themselves.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Georgia does not expect that during the next decade $50,000 will cover the expense of administering this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This is really an emergency bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no limitation upon it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; there is no limitation, but there is a limitation on this appropriation, and the real object of the bill is to meet the emergency that now confronts us.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does not the Senator think the policy is a good one for permanent adoption?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not prepared to say. I know it is essential now, and it may be that it will prove beneficial permanently; but the appropriation is made for only one year, and the special value of the bill was considered for the coming year.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the appropriation is indefinite. It simply appropriates $50,000 to be available until expended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. And of course, if the department should be in the midst of its work when it had expended its appropriation, I assume Congress would replenish the treasury and continue the work. Now, I am not objecting to the proposal in the bill. I do not know enough about it to know whether it is required or not. I would not question the judgment of the Senator from Georgia with regard to its necessity and policy; but I rose to register my protest against providing another department of the Government that may employ a great number of people without any provision with respect to the manner of their employment or the compensation which they shall be paid.

Personally I think the warehousemen or the owners of the cotton ought to pay the expenses of grading, inspection, and other expenses of that kind. There is no such provision here; but if the Government is to assume this duty and is to pay the expense involved Congress ought to determine how many persons shall be employed and how much they shall be paid before they shall enter the service. We are falling into the habit of referring everything to a department and allowing it to cover all the real essentials of a subject by rules and regulations. We are abdicating our legislative power and passing it over in this instance to the Department of Agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I wish to have the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment that was agreed to as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. GRONNA. The amendment that is to be voted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, adopted an amendment; and the bill now being in the Senate, the question is whether the amendment made in Committee of the Whole shall be concurred in. If the Senator desires, it will be again read for his information.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes; I do.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I ask if that amendment has been adopted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment was adopted as in Committee of the Whole. Now the question is, the bill having come into the Senate, Shall the amendment adopted as in Committee of the Whole be concurred in? That is the question now before the Senate.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I did not know that this bill was coming up just at this moment. I am very anxious that the bill shall be amended so as to include grain, and I can see no good reason why grain should not be included as well as tobacco. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has introduced a bill the provisions of which are practically the same as those of the bill now pending before the Senate; and if it is in order I am going to offer an amendment, or several amendments, so that it will include grain and flaxseed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to state to the Senator that the question now is, Shall the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole be concurred in by the Senate? After that is disposed of, the bill will still be in the Senate and still open to amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. I might just as well address myself to the bill, I suppose, while the amendment is pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, of course; but the Chair was suggesting that the amendment suggested by the Senator would hardly be in order until the Senate disposes of the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. Of course the Senator is in order in addressing the Chair.

Mr. GRONNA. Then I will wait until this amendment is disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is in the Senate and still open to amendment.

Mr. GRONNA and Mr. LEE of Maryland addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say to the Senator from North Dakota that the Senator from Maryland had sought recognition before the Senator from North Dakota addressed the Chair, and there will be time for the Senator from North Dakota to be recognized later.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment which adds a new section to the bill, which I will explain when it is read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section, after the amendment just agreed to, to read as follows:

That wherever in any State there may exist a State warehouse system or State warehouses operated under State laws for the receipt, sampling, or grading of cotton or tobacco or naval stores the Secretary of Agriculture may appoint a Federal warehouse agent for that State, who shall give bond and be subject to all the regulations of this act as the custodian of the cotton or tobacco or naval stores which may be stored through his agency or be under his supervision or control; and such State agent shall, under such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe, and subject to the general provisions and purposes of this act, be authorized to receive and thereafter deposit cotton, tobacco, or naval stores as a trustee into the custody of the State warehouse or warehouse system, and which said system of warehouses he may use as though an owner or operator or warehouseman, subject to the provisions of his bond; and receipts issued to such State agent as trustee may be transferred by him to the owners of the tobacco or cotton or naval stores represented, as provided for with reference to other receipts issued under the provisions of this act.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I should like to have the Senators especially interested in this bill understand the purport of this amendment.

We have in Maryland a very large and comprehensive system of tobacco warehouses, which are controlled and operated by the State through the agency of certain tobacco inspectors, who are bonded officers. This is a system of storage and a system of sampling. It would be impossible for this tobacco system to be operated under the provisions of this act without the addition of a new section. This new section simply gives discretion to the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint an agent for the State who shall operate as a trustee and make the deposits in the State warehouses, so that our Maryland system of tobacco warehouses can get the benefit of this act and all the good that will flow from its provisions.

Of course, this act, as the Senators will realize, provides for inspection. It provides for the Secretary's prescribing the duties of the warehouse people and taking bonds. It authorizes the issuing of a license. Now, of course you can not issue a Federal license to a State warehouse and require the State warehouse to bond itself to the Federal Government. There is a complication in the procedure as to this State, but it is perfectly feasible to appoint a State agent or trustee who shall represent the tobacco growers and owners of a particular State, or the owners of cotton, if there is any such warehouse system in other States, or for naval stores, and to act in their behalf, and make the deposits in the State system of warehouses as an individual would in this system that is provided to be under national control.

So what I suggest as an additional section is entirely optional with the Secretary of Agriculture and enables him to act, if need be. There is need to permit the operation of this national warehouse system with reference to the Maryland State system, which is now practically in use by the great majority of the tobacco growers of our State.

As I look upon the situation, unless this provision is adopted our State warehouse system will not be able to get the benefit of this bill, and one or two corporate-owned warehouses will have the benefit and control under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland indicates what I have really thought all the time, that Senators interested in a tobacco warehousing system would probably handle their subject better if they prepared a bill applicable to that exact subject, instead of adding tobacco, with the provisions required for handling tobacco, to our cotton warehousing bill, as those provisions do not adjust themselves well to the provisions of the cotton warehouse bill.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Is there any provision in the amendment that does not adjust itself entirely to this system and is not subject to the entire control and discretion and regulation of the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The amendment involves lines of work that I scarcely grasp, because I am entirely unfamiliar with the local situation with reference to the State bonded warehouses. I do not understand the system. We have nothing of that kind with reference to cotton, so far as I know, in a single cotton State. A system of warehousing has been built up for tobacco that is entirely foreign to any system of warehousing for cotton.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will say to the Senator that I can not see that this will affect detrimentally the bill. It strikes me that it is the object of the bill to give licenses by the General Government, and we who have State warehouses for tobacco would like to have that stamp put upon our tobacco. We ask you to give us the opportunity and allow us to protect our people who put their tobacco in our warehouses.

It does seem to me that there can be no objection to this, because it is merely licensing men to investigate the State warehouse as well as the private warehouse. I can see no reason why it would be detrimental in any way to the object of the bill which the Senator from Georgia has in charge.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I should like to ask the Senator from Georgia another question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. On reflection, does not the Senator think that it would be really unfair to our elaborate system of tobacco warehouses to provide a system that would enable individuals or corporations to come in and destroy this application of State energy and State money which is so satisfactory to the tobacco growers of our State?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not prepared to say that tobacco ought to have been put into the bill at all. I did not desire tobacco warehouses to be put into it. We really had worked out the bill solely with a view of reaching a most extreme condition that confronted the cotton situation in the South. In preparing the bill we had no thought of making it applicable to anything except cotton. We felt justified in preparing the bill with reference to cotton alone when we had in mind the fact that it is our greatest export crop for the entire country, and the one great money crop of 12 States, and that practically no preparation has been made to meet the war status that now confronts the marketing of the crop.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I will ask the Senator from Georgia if he does not think, in view of the fact that $50,000,000 worth of tobacco is exported from this country, and 16 States involved in it, it is proper and right to those States that their interests should be protected, as well as the interests in the cotton States and other States?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. At this time the tobacco business is absolutely at a standstill. The people who have their money in tobacco can not realize a dollar upon it. If there is not some provision made by which they will be protected and financed, in a way they will have to sacrifice their crop. I can see no reason why this interest should not be taken care of.

I admit that this is the bill of the Senator from Georgia, but at the same time if you can add something else, as it has been added here for naval stores and tobacco, I do not see what objection there can be to making the same rule which applies to cotton apply to tobacco and naval stores. It seems to me that it will strengthen the Senator's bill to bring in statements of products of this kind that are in the same boat as cotton. I can see no reason why there should be any objection on the part of anyone to including in the bill tobacco and naval stores. The principle is the same, the object to be secured is the same, and I do hope the Senator will not find any objection to including this product, which is equally in the same trouble as cotton. Certainly it will not hurt his bill, but will help more people.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Georgia. As I understand the object sought to be accomplished by the Senator from Maryland, it is on account of the condition in connection with tobacco in Maryland. An amendment has gone on the bill including tobacco, and the amendment was concurred in by all the representatives of the tobacco States. An amendment including naval stores was offered by the Senator from Florida at the request of those interested in that industry. It would seem to me that if the Senator from Maryland would strike out "cotton" and "naval stores" in the amendment he offered and confine it to tobacco there would be no objection to it and it would not interfere with the bill at all.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. If the Senator will permit me, I should be very glad to strike out "naval stores and cotton," because I only meant it to apply to the Maryland State system of warehouses, and I do not want to complicate any condition existing elsewhere. But in view of the fact that the tobacco growers of this country and the tobacco growers of Maryland especially, whose tobacco is largely sold in France, Belgium, and England, are just as much entitled to consideration in this bill as are the cotton growers in whom the Senator from Georgia is so properly and naturally and legitimately interested, and I submit that the same generosity and breadth of view that the Senate is called upon to extend to the cotton growers of the country is equally and properly applicable to tobacco as a crop. It is a crop that does not spoil in keeping, and it is handled in definite packages capable of being made the basis of this receipt system. I sincerely hope the Senator from Georgia will not object to protecting us in a proper way, so that we can take part in the benefits of this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I should like to say to the Senator from Georgia that in talking with the officials of the Treasury Department in regard to taking care of these various interests it is in entire accord with their views that tobacco shall be included in any protection that is proposed to be given to the cotton product; and I can see no reason why it should apply to cotton and not apply to other products that are equally as valuable and which need attention as much as cotton.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield further to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator from Georgia said if unanimous consent was given he would accept the amendment as to tobacco, and he has accepted it. There is as great necessity, if not more, for providing for tobacco than there is for providing for cotton, if a greater necessity could exist. Take Austria, take Italy, and take Germany, where the tobacco is sold, it is a Government monopoly in many of those countries, and it is absolutely impossible to obtain a market there. The cotton planters can not be in a condition any more distressful than are the tobacco raisers on account of present conditions. The Austrian Government buys millions of pounds of tobacco, and there is really no market for it at all. There is very little market now in Italy. Consequently there is need for relief when a large portion of the tobacco is absolutely without a market at all now. The tobacco raisers are entitled to be treated with the same consideration as the cotton planters, and the same benefits ought to be extended to them.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida was accepted by the Senator from Georgia as a part of the bill, and the amendment has been adopted. Now, the Senator from Maryland offers an amendment which provides for appointing an agent to represent the State tobacco warehouses. The amendment includes also naval stores. The only desire is to take care of the situation where there are State warehouses for tobacco. Consequently I suggest that it will not interfere with the bill which the Senator from Georgia has in charge if the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland shall be confined to tobacco alone. I am satisfied the Senator from Georgia will have no objection to its being incorporated in the bill in that form.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. That has been agreed to.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. If that is acceptable to the Senator from Georgia, of course I am willing to do it. I simply want to make my amendment as broad as the unanimous-consent agreement which was to take care of all these three commodities. I do not think the unanimous-consent agreement would be carried out if the bill was passed in such a shape that it would do no good to the tobacco people of Maryland, who have their tobacco in the State warehouse system.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, my attitude upon the subject is simply this: The greatest interest involved by far is cotton. The cotton interest is the greatest interest to all the people of the entire country. I called the attention of the Senate to the fact several days ago that last year the cotton exported to foreign countries brought back to the United States $610,000,000 in gold and that the entire crop was worth over a billion dollars. The crop, including the seed, to-day with a normal market would sell for a billion dollars.

So, Mr. President, the great agricultural interest in the United States that has been affected by the European war is the cotton interest. Over 60 per cent of our cotton is exported, and that export trade has been suddenly suspended as a consequence of the war.

I took occasion to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that the intrinsic value of the cotton still remains and that within a period of two years the selling price will be as high as if the war had not taken place, because the lint cotton will be required for consumption, and the clothing made of it will be needed to be worn. While finer fabrics as a result of the war may be less used, coarser fabrics will be more used and the coarser fabrics and cheaper fabrics will require by far more raw material of cotton than the finer fabrics.

The people who have produced this cotton are confronted with a serious condition. They have practically no market, because nearly two-thirds of their product should go abroad. It is the object of the bill to facilitate their use of warehouse receipts for the purpose of obtaining advances, for the purpose of making loans, or for the purpose of selling their cotton itself to small investors. Those of us who have studied this question are sure that it is of vast importance to the owners who will soon have ready for market this immense crop.

I feel, Mr. President, that I have the right to appeal to Senators not to seek to load this bill down with anything that will stop it.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not yield just now to the Senator from Maryland. I do not think any Senator ought to be willing to load the bill down. My view of it is this: If the Senators representing any commodity could unite and say that we, representing all the States producing the commodity, want a certain amendment, I would yield to it.

Mr. LANE. I wish to call the Senator's attention to one industry that I think is in the same distressed condition, and that is the canned-salmon industry. I wish to include that.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Georgia yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. As I read the provisions of the bill it simply gives a greater security and a greater confidence to the cotton certificates that may be issued, and those who may advance money on them or purchase them outright will feel that by doing so there would be no question as to the cotton being on hand in the warehouses under Government supervision at any time they may want it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is just as far as the bill goes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is as I understand it; it is as I read it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And it does not require them to take out a license. It is simply a privilege to anyone who has a warehouse to take out a license. He is not required to take it out. It is just an opportunity given to those who wish to use it.

Mr. SMOOT. And to-day there are certificates issued on deposits of cotton in private warehouses.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Entirely so.

Mr. SMOOT. And those are accepted many times in communities by the banks, for they know that the cotton is there.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There are some very large cotton warehouses in the South that will not think of taking out a license. They are already established. They already have their standing and are known. Already their certificates could be floated in New York or in Boston. They will not in all probability ask for a license.

This bill is expected to broaden the opportunity to hold or dispose of cotton so much needed on account of the great emergency that confronts the farmer who raised it. The great value which by this bill I believe will be given to our people will be acquired within the next 90 days; certainly within the next four months.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. While it is true, as the Senator from Georgia has said, that individuals or corporations now issue warehouse receipts, is it not true that under the bill a planter may keep the cotton in his own warehouse and the Government will inspect it and the planter or farmer can then use this certificate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not think so. I do not think a man can retain possession of his own personal property and get the benefit of a warehouse certificate against it. The warehouse certificate is the evidence of ownership by one person of property held in custody by another person.

Mr. GRONNA. Section 2 provides—

That the term "warehouse" as used in this act shall be deemed to mean every building, compress, ginhouse, and other structure in which any cotton is, or may be, stored or held for, or in the course of, interstate or foreign commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; but I do not think the benefit of a warehouse certificate could be obtained except where the owner of the cotton does not own the warehouse.

Mr. GRONNA. Would it not be possible for the owner of cotton to call for an inspection and secure a certificate just as well if the cotton is in his own warehouse?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not think so, because there the man still has possession of his own property. The benefit of a warehouse certificate is the fact that A, the owner, has deposited with B, the warehouseman, and B issues his certificate to A, recognizing the fact that A has deposited cotton in B's warehouse. If the man should retain possession of the cotton there would be no security at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand that the Senator from Georgia accepted the amendment of the Senator from Florida admitting tobacco and naval stores to the privileges of this act?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did accept it, and it is a part of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Senator to be arguing against it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; the Senator misunderstood me. I was doing nothing of the sort.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator permit me to inject a remark in his statement in answer to the suggestion that there is any greater emergency in the present conditions with respect to cotton than with respect to tobacco?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was really replying to a speech on that subject by other Senators who had been discussing the interest of tobacco.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator, after accepting the amendment, was intimating, if not saying, that there is a greater emergency with reference to cotton than tobacco. Now, I want to say to the Senator, if he will permit me very briefly, that while of course——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator to yield to me.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator just wished to make a statement of a word or two, yes; but if it is to make a speech, I would rather wait and let him make it in his own time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not want to make a speech, Mr. President, but in view of what the Senator has said I think he ought to permit me now to state the reason why there is the same situation with reference to tobacco that there is with reference to cotton, and also to correct an error which he has made, I think, in the assumption he has indulged in that there are any difficulties with respect to warehousing tobacco that do not exist with respect to warehousing cotton.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator does not wish me to make that statement by way of an interruption I will wait until he finishes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not say there are greater difficulties with reference to warehousing tobacco than cotton. The Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator did so intimate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; that was not my statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator object to my making a statement?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not object at all to the Senator making a speech at any time he sees fit and I yield to him now.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not wish to make a speech. I simply want to correct what I think is an error in the conclusions of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to his colleague.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am speaking in the time of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. I did not understand the Senator from Georgia to say that cotton was any more entitled to this relief than tobacco, but merely that there was a different way in which each was handled.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think there is any different way, and that is what I wish to point out.

Mr. WEST. Have not a number of States already their own warehouses for handling tobacco?

Mr. SIMMONS. One, I understand, the State of Maryland, and it is a very easy matter by a simple amendment to provide for the exceptional conditions which exist in Maryland.

If the Senator will permit me, I wish to say to the Senate, because I do not wish any misunderstanding about this matter, that we raise in my State both cotton and tobacco, and I think I understand the situation of the cotton farmer and the tobacco farmer. I believe they are to-day, with respect to the conditions that have been brought about by the war, exactly in the same boat, confronted with exactly the same difficulties. The difficulty of the cotton man is that there is no foreign demand for his surplus cotton, which he has heretofore been selling abroad. The difficulty of the tobacco producer is that there is no demand for the part of the tobacco crop which he has heretofore been selling abroad. The only difference is that the cotton planters sell two-thirds of their cotton abroad, while the tobacco planters sell about one-third of their tobacco abroad. There is a difference in the amount which they market abroad, but there are no buyers of tobacco or of cotton for foreign consumption.

Now, there are buyers, or will be buyers, of cotton for domestic consumption, but there may be no buyers of tobacco for domestic consumption for the reason that there is a custom which has grown up, and which obtains in the tobacco trade in this country, by which the tobacco manufacturers carry in their warehouses a sufficient supply to answer their needs for from one to two years. That makes the tobacco situation a little worse than the cotton situation at present. Now let me say to the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. The Senator understands that I accepted the tobacco amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood that.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It has been adopted and it is a part of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood that, and I understood the Senator to be making a speech which I thought was unfriendly to the amendment he had accepted.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Not at all. I called attention to the peculiar conditions in Maryland, and I was just appealing to the Senator from Maryland not to load the bill down with anything that would produce a condition of affairs where it might be impossible to pass it.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator accepts the amendment, I have nothing more to say.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not know whether I will have anything more to say or not; but I have accepted the amendment. If the Senator had been here all the time, probably he would have understood that our real trouble comes from a different source.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have been here all the time and I heard everything the Senator said.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me finish the statement. I have the floor, if the Senator please.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Georgia before he takes his seat. I understood the Senator from Georgia had the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let the Senator from North Carolina finish his statement.

Mr. WHITE. Very well; I will wait until the Senator from North Carolina concludes.

Mr. SIMMONS. All I wish to say in addition, Mr. President, is that there is really less trouble about warehousing tobacco to-day than there is about warehousing cotton. At present, under the rules which obtain in selling tobacco, tobacco is sampled and graded before it goes into the warehouse. There are already warehouses amply sufficient to accommodate the domestic demand—that is to say, the part of the crop that is bought for domestic consumption. There are not warehouses sufficient to accommodate the part of the crop that is bought for exportation. That is exported very quickly and is not warehoused. That part of it which is warehoused is graded before it goes into the warehouses, and it will be a very simple process; there will be none of the complications that probably will exist with reference to inspecting cotton, because it is already inspected, already graded, and in warehouses. All the tobacco men want is the same Government certificates that that tobacco is stored in a certain warehouse in certain quantities of certain grades so that the owner may take the certificate and go to the bank and get money readily upon it just exactly as the cotton man wants the certificate of the Government as to the storage of his product in a warehouse that it may facilitate the process of getting money upon a receipt.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I understood the Senator from Georgia has agreed to this amendment to the provision that naval stores and cotton be stricken out, and therefore I take it for granted the matter is settled.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to interrupt the Senator from Georgia for just a moment. I want to say I am heartily in favor of this amendment, and I believe it is a necessity. But I wish to inquire, in the absence of any revenue or commerce transportation feature, where we find a warrant for it under the Constitution, or whether it is purely a matter of privilege?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is drawn as a matter of privilege. No one is required to obtain a license. It also declares that it applies to cotton held for or in course of interstate or foreign commerce. This language will be found in paragraph 2, section 2, as drawn.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, is the bill now open to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; there is an amendment pending. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland. The Chair understands the Senator has modified the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I have.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

That wherever in any State there may exist a State warehouse system or State warehouses operated under State laws for the receipt, sampling, or grading of tobacco, the Secretary of Agriculture may appoint a Federal warehouse agent for that State, who shall give bond and be subject to all the regulations of this act as the custodian of the tobacco which may be stored through his agency or be under his supervision or control; and such State agent shall, under such regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe and subject to the general provisions and purposes of this act, be authorized to receive and thereafter deposit as a trustee into the custody of the State warehouse or warehouse system, and which said system of warehouses he may use as though an owner or operator or warehouseman, subject to the provisions of his bond, and receipts issued to such State agent as trustee may be transferred by him to the owners of the tobacco represented, as provided for with reference to other receipts issued under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendment will be agreed to. The Chair hears none and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to have included in this bill as an amendment to it the words "canned salmon," following the word "cotton" with the proper punctuation.

There is an article which is in the same condition and the people who produce it are as distressed as are the people who produce cotton. They have fished the waters and caught the salmon, cooked them, and canned them, and they will keep for years. They are an excellent article of food. The Secretary of Commerce reports that pound for pound they are one of the most nutritious foods. He made that statement in one of his recent reports.

The people who are engaged in this business have expended their own money and have also borrowed capital from banks. They have stored this salmon in warehouses, in cans properly sealed and protected it from the weather, waiting to send it to Europe to the market. The market is mostly a foreign market. Those engaged in this industry are just as much entitled to these privileges as are any other class of citizens. Their predicament is just as urgent; their case is as emergent. Salmon is as useful for food as is cotton for clothing. Cotton is all right, and I have no objection to aiding those who raise it in the emergency that now exists.

I am asking of the Senator from Georgia, in justice to the people on the Pacific coast, who have not objected to the storing of cotton and warehouse certificates being issued for it, that he allow those people to include their salmon. It will mean the introduction of but two words, and then every provision of the bill will apply to canned salmon without change in the measure.

I offer, then, as an amendment to insert the words "canned salmon," following the word "cotton" throughout the bill. I ask the Senator from Georgia if he will not accept it; and if not, why he will not accept it?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will first state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Wherever the word "cotton" appears in the bill it is proposed to insert the words "or canned salmon."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will be rejected. I only want to say a word about it. This bill was really intended to cover a great commodity—cotton—involving a billion dollars. I did not wish to extend its provisions even to tobacco and to naval stores, but I finally yielded. I can not consent to extend it any further. If Senators desire legislation of this sort with reference to salmon, I think they ought to prepare it and put it on its own basis.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I will say that here is a bill which carries relief for the producers of cotton. That is right and commendable. In addition to that, it takes care of tar, pitch, turpentine, and oakum. Those are the naval stores which were used in the days when we first built ships; we calked the old wooden ship with oakum. There may be some stores additional to those since, but under the common acceptation of the phrase——

Mr. SWANSON. Let me ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LANE. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. The main purpose of this bill now is to take care of an emergency respecting cotton and tobacco. There are different grades of tobacco and different grades of cotton. Until you get a certificate as to a certain class of cotton you can not prove whether it is worth 8 or 12 cents a pound. As to tobacco, without a certificate you can not prove whether it is worth 8 cents or 15 cents.

This bill is simply designed to permit a grading, so that the producers can go to a bank with a certificate as to its value. Do the same conditions apply as to salmon? Is it graded?

Mr. LANE. It is all graded.

Mr. SWANSON. Is it your purpose to have it graded like different grades of cotton or tobacco?

Mr. LANE. It is.

Mr. SWANSON. And deposited in warehouses?

Mr. LANE. It is.

Mr. SWANSON. And certificates issued on it?

Mr. LANE. Yes; every purpose is the same as with reference to cotton and tobacco. This bill also provides for tobacco; it takes care of tobacco.

Mr. CUMMINS. When do you grade salmon—before they are killed or after they are put into the cans?

Mr. LANE. The salmon are graded according to the variety of salmon which are caught. In the Columbia River they catch and can the celebrated Chinook salmon; then later in the season they catch and can what is called steel-head salmon; on Puget Sound they catch the silver side; in Alaska they catch and can the king salmon, the Quinault, and a number of others. They are all known generically and specifically; there is just as much difference between them as there is between the names and the personal appearance of Senators in this Chamber. Under the provisions of the pure-food act every can is branded with exactly what it contains. We want to get them inspected by the Government and to be allowed the privilege of issuing certificates upon them.

This bill provides for the care of tobacco, which is not a necessity of life. It is necessary for the people who raise tobacco, perhaps, to have this relief; and I am glad to see them get it. I think the men who raise wheat and who raise corn and who saw lumber, perhaps, ought also to be taken care of. We would then have a nice rural credit system, for which the people are anxious; but inasmuch as we are going to extend paternalism and the wing of the Government and its aid over this land, they who need the help and are entitled to it should have it. We need it; and I appeal to the Senator, to his sense of justice, to accept the amendment. Salmon is an article upon exactly the same basis as the articles which he favors, and these people needing the help and having an article which can be graded just as surely as can cotton, why not give it to them? Why not allow these people, who go out and breast the storm and gather in this good food product, this relief? I am going to insist on it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator another question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LANE. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. My first question was purely preliminary, because I assumed that the fish had to be caught before being graded. How many additional employees would be required to grade the salmon of the country?

Mr. LANE. There would be required merely a nominal number. The salmon is already graded and easily identified. It would only be necessary to certify to the grade and would require very few employees.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would not be necessary for an inspector to accompany every fishing boat?

Mr. LANE. No. The salmon are packed away on the shelves, where one inspector could grade thousands of them. He could grade hundreds of tons of them in a day.

Mr. CUMMINS. But he could not look into the cans and see what was in the cans.

Mr. LANE. There is usually but one kind canned at a cannery at a certain season of the year. On the Columbia River there are several kinds, but they are easily identified; they are easily graded, and an inspector can be there when they are being canned, and even after they are canned.

Mr. CUMMINS. What would you do with the certificates after you got them?

Mr. LANE. The same thing that my friends will do with cotton certificates, I presume.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know what they will do with them, but I should like to know what is to become of these warehouse receipts.

Mr. LANE. They are certificates showing that some one has so much canned salmon on hand of a certain certified grade and quality, and he might be able to go out and borrow money upon it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Oregon understand that a warehouse receipt of that character is a paper upon which additional currency could be issued?

Mr. LANE. No; but I had an idea perhaps that you could go to a Federal reserve bank and secure a little advance upon them. They do secure advances from banks in ordinary times, but they are now deprived of their market. I think I know they could borrow money upon the certificates to tide them over.

Mr. CUMMINS. They might borrow money upon the certificates; but I will ask the Senator from Georgia for information, whether in his opinion the Federal reserve act embraces paper of this kind as one of the securities upon which additional currency could be based?

Mr. LANE. I do not know whether it does or not. I have an idea that perhaps such paper can be used in securing money from the reserve banks, and perhaps an additional issue may be based upon such securities. I presume it is intended as one of the types of securities upon which money may be issued by such banks. That is my assumption.

Mr. CUMMINS. We would finally reach the situation in which all the property of the country would become the foundation for our paper money. That would be a general asset system with a vengeance.

Mr. LANE. I am not attempting to secure that; I am attempting now to secure relief for an industry which needs relief and which is just as much entitled to it on merit as is any other industry and against which there should be no prejudice. I am going to appeal to the Senators from the South to assist me in securing this relief.

My colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], I think, will indorse what I have said as to the plight in which these men are. They have written to us complaining of their unfortunate condition, for the reason that their market, like the market for cotton, is a foreign market; and Senators know in what condition foreign trade now is. I will ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I merely desire to say one word further against the amendment of the Senator from Oregon, pointing out the difference between the policy of this bill and what he seems seriously desirous of adding to it. At first I was not sure but he meant his amendment as a piece of sarcasm against the entire bill, but later on I concluded that he was entirely serious about it.

Mr. LANE. Absolutely.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, the difficulty about adding such promiscuous products is that they have no staple value; they have no recognized value all over the world. Lint cotton has a uniform value in normal times all over the world; it is just like a bar of gold in its value all over the world; you can take a bale of cotton in normal times and get gold on it in London or anywhere else.

The benefit to be derived from the proposed legislation as it affects cotton is a benefit which is far-reaching, one which applies to the entire country, which is national in its scope. The size of the crop, its commercial relation to 12 States producing it and to the entire country place it in a class entirely distinct. Nothing of the kind can be claimed for Boston baked beans, perhaps, although they are frequently used, or for Oregon salmon; and if you intend to carry the principle that far, in all seriousness, then perhaps it should be extended to canned tomatoes, or, as the Senator from Kansas suggests, to canned corn.

I really did not think Senators ought to have sought to add naval stores and tobacco. I think those products are hardly in a class to justify their inclusion; but on the insistence of Senators, and with a great deal of hesitation, I yielded. Cotton is the chief export agricultural product of the United States, and the conditions affecting it reach to 12 States. It is almost the one money crop of 12 entire States, and the commerce of those States rests upon it; and the desirability of facilitating its use as a basis for all the business of those States is involved. The immense sum derived from the export of cotton—$610,000,000 last year—affects the prosperity of the entire country and justifies this legislation to handle not a local but a great national problem.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to say, in answer to the Senator from Georgia, that the value of canned salmon according to grade is just as certain and varies as little as does that of cotton. It has an absolute standard fixed value; you can take it into the European markets and secure gold upon it; and that is exactly what is done with it. It is not in class with Boston baked beans, for the reason that there is merely a local demand for that article, whereas canned salmon is used largely in foreign countries, especially in England, France, and Germany.

We raise no cotton on the Pacific coast, but Alaska, Washington, Oregon, and California produce shiploads of canned salmon, and it ought to be included in the bill.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. LANE. I do.

Mr. WHITE. I hope the Senator will not further reflect on the products of New England when there is no representative on the floor of the Senate from that section.

Mr. LANE. I will not.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I am very free to say I can not see any reason why Oregon salmon should not stand in quite as favorable a light as North Carolina tobacco. It is certainly quite as much an article of necessity and of general diet as that product. I would not use the stuff for my life, but I do use salmon; and it seems to me we must admit the same sort of argument that would apply to the naval stores of North Carolina might apply to Oregon salmon.

As I think of it, I become wonderfully interested in this product. If the products of other Senators are going to be protected or if they are to have the benefit of Government certificates, I want to know what, in the name of heaven, the products of my State are going to have? We have a little product in New Jersey which is of world-wide renown, and which no man, woman, or child can touch without being revivified and brought into new life and carried into the realm of glorious things. It does seem to me that there ought to be some method of having the Government certify that the product to which I refer is of the proper standard.

Of course I need not mention to you what that product is, for we are known as the Garden State; we raise fruit ad libitum, and among other fruits one of our greatest is apples. In God's wisdom he made that fruit so that it decays quite rapidly; and the genius of Jerseymen, early in the history of our land, conceived the plan of expressing the juice, distilling it, bottling it, and sending it forth to the world. That product they called applejack. Why should not that product also be protected?

But, seriously, I do not know why Oregon salmon should not just as well be covered by this bill as tobacco. Personally, I think tobacco is a good deal of a nuisance. I see men chew it, and it is an abomination to me. I see them smoke it and fill God's free, pure air with stifling fumes, and to me it is most obnoxious. Almost every doctor in the land tells us to pass laws against its use; in fact, many of the States have barred the youth of our land from the use of cigarettes. Tobacco is the foundation of cigarettes, so that my friend from North Carolina, and I presume my friend from Georgia—and there is some of the stuff raised in Connecticut—when they safeguard and protect tobacco are really doing that which does not add to the welfare of man, but does stifle him and make him dull and prosy.

I think salmon is pretty good, and, while I will not press my New Jersey product, for I am afraid the bill would be utterly loaded down if I did, I say seriously that my friend from Oregon is about right.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEST. Does applejack add to the welfare of the country?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, it depends upon the view of the man who takes it, and it depends entirely upon the equilibrium that the God of the universe has put in the man. I have seen some men take applejack and go up like a skyrocket, and I know some others who have taken it and lived to ripe old years to glorify their country and add to its history and to the general reputation of their families.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I had hoped that the Senator from Georgia would agree to include in his bill the amendment which I had intended to offer, so that the bill would cover all kinds of grain. I shall not take up the time of the Senate this afternoon to go into that question; but we know that there is as much money involved in various kinds of grain in the United States as there is in cotton.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The only reason I did not agree to it is that I was notified by certain Senators from the grain States that if I did so they would fight the bill indefinitely. I am embarrassed by what seems to be a disagreement among Senators from the grain States. It is not my own action; it is the division which existed between them which embarrasses me. I had hoped to be in a position to accept the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I am very glad to know that. I was quite sure the Senator from Georgia would have no objection to having it incorporated in the pending bill. The question of licensing bonded warehouses for grain has received consideration, and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] has introduced a bill covering grain, which is practically along the lines of the pending bill.

As I said a moment ago, there is as much money involved in the crop of grain; in fact, there is more money involved in the grain crops in the United States than there is in the cotton crops. This year alone it is estimated that we will have 930,000,000 bushels of wheat. I believe that estimate is too high; but, at any rate, we will possibly have about 800,000,000 bushels of wheat, to say nothing of oats, barley, rye, flaxseed, and corn.

Of course, I do not wish to defeat the measure proposed by the Senator from Georgia; I have assured him that I would support it, and I feel like supporting it; but I believe that it would only be fair to include all kinds of grain and flaxseed in the bill.

The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], as I have said, has already introduced a bill relating to grain, which has been referred to the Committee on Agriculture. I want to ask the Senator from Oklahoma, who I see is present, wherein his bill differs from the pending bill?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that the end contemplated by the two bills is the same. The different methods of handling the two crops require a difference of detail in the two measures. The grain measure is adapted to the particular methods of handling that crop, whereas the cotton bill is, of course, adapted to the peculiar methods of handling that crop, and the customs attending the business; but the main objects and purposes of the two bills are identical, and I hope that at an early date we shall be able to follow the cotton bill, if it passes, with the passage of the grain bill.

I have no disposition to discriminate between the two. Whatever advantages or benefits will accrue to the cotton growers of the South by the passage of the pending measure ought, if possible, to be made available to the grain growers of the West and the North. I doubt either the propriety or the necessity of encumbering the pending measure by various other amendments such as have been proposed. If this legislation is meritorious, each staple crop that calls for such legislation ought to receive it at our hands. I believe there will be no disposition on the part of the Senate to defeat either measure if in the wisdom of the Senate it will be found desirable to pass either one.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a further question? If the two bills are practically alike, can there be any other reason for not incorporating them into one bill than the possibility of the grain bill being defeated?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish it were so that the two measures could be incorporated into one so as to avoid suggestions that have been made here that one section or that one crop was receiving attention while others were being neglected. I should like to have averted even a momentary suggestion of that sort. I think, however, that the grain bill will encounter some opposition that does not exist toward the cotton bill. The Senator will doubtless apprehend what I have in mind.

Mr. GRONNA. Yes. I will ask the Senator if it is proposed to establish two different bureaus in the Department of Agriculture, one for cotton and tobacco and another one for wheat or grain?

Mr. GORE. I do not think that either bill contemplates the establishment of a separate and independent bureau. Doubtless there would be a bureau or division——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The matter will be taken care of by the marketing division.

Mr. GORE. To take charge of this matter, which would come under the general supervision of the marketing division, which I assume would have direction and control over both measures in case of their passage. I am as heartily in favor of the one measure as the other, and I believe that both will be fraught with benefits for the producers of the two crops, cotton and grain. My State is deeply interested in both, and I shall certainly cooperate with the Senator from North Dakota and all who share his views in pressing that measure to passage.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to thank the Senator for the information, as well as for his assurance of support. I am deeply interested not only in the producers of grain but in the producers of cotton, and since it has developed that there is opposition in the grain States to including the grain bill in the bill of the Senator from Georgia, I shall not ask for it, because I do not wish to defeat this measure. I believe it is meritorious, and if we can not accomplish for the grain growers what we should accomplish, I do not want to be the cause of defeating legislation which will be of substantial benefit, as I believe it will be, to the cotton growers of the South.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. GRONNA. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator if he has made up his mind that he will not offer the amendment he contemplated offering?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the statement made by the Senator from Oklahoma, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, a moment ago leads me to believe that if the amendment is offered, and if wheat and other grain should be included in this bill, there is danger of defeating it.

Mr. NORRIS. It would seem to me that that question would be determined by the vote upon the Senator's amendment. I had very much hoped that the Senator would offer his amendment including grain, and if it is voted down he can still support the pending bill; but I do not believe that he ought to desist just because some Senator says he is going to oppose the bill if such a provision is added to it.

Mr. GRONNA. In accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska, I will submit the matter to the Senate with the understanding, of course, that if the amendment is voted down I shall support the measure as it is now framed.

Mr. SMOOT. A parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, this bill was taken up by unanimous consent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And with the understanding on the part of the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] that the grain bill should not be considered in connection with this bill. Am I right in that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would not state, without recourse to the record, as to whether or not that was made a part of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was the understanding, undoubtedly, between the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Minnesota that the grain question would not be taken up.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, Mr. President, unless the record is to the contrary, I distinctly remember that there was no agreement that it should not be taken up. The Senator from Georgia stated that he hoped it would not be taken up.

If the Senator from North Dakota will yield, I should like to inquire if his proposition is that the Government shall establish warehouses for grain similar to those proposed for cotton, so that the farmers can store their grain and get certificates and use them in exactly the same way that it is proposed to use certificates as to cotton?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, my amendment would be to simply add, after the word "cotton," the words "grain and flaxseed," and then to add the words "elevators and warehouses" where necessary.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, there can be nothing more desirable. We passed a bill here this afternoon providing for the purchase of the products of the silver miners. Now, the proposition which the Senator from North Dakota suggests is that the Government, in connection with the cotton warehouses, which I am perfectly willing shall be established, shall establish warehouses for grain, so that the farmer will not have to put it on the market and sell it at 60 cents when it is worth 75 cents, but can put it in a warehouse and not let some speculator get it and make a profit of 15 or 20 cents a bushel on it within 90 days, as was done within the last 90 days. If the American Congress wants to do something that will be of some benefit to the great farming masses west of the Mississippi River, they can not do anything better than to attach the amendment suggested by the Senator from North Dakota to this bill.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Kansas is right. My proposition is to place grain on an equality with cotton and tobacco, and that is all I ask. Of course——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, my only object was to keep the record of the Senate straight. I have not said a word as to whether or not I will oppose this bill.

Mr. GRONNA. If the Senator will pardon me, as to the unanimous-consent agreement, I will say to the Senator that I was absent for about 5 or 10 minutes—not to exceed 10 minutes—getting my lunch. I doubt if there was a quorum present, and there was no question of a quorum raised; so that if unanimous consent was given I do not consider it valid. I do not think the Senator should raise that question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not understand that the unanimous-consent agreement was to cut off the Senator from North Dakota from offering his amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not propose to be shut out by any technical rule.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not understand that I was asking any unanimous consent that would shut off the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what I am trying to do is to find out what the unanimous consent was. I am not trying to shut off the Senator at all. I ask that the record may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well. The Reporter will read the record. Then there will not be any question as to what occurred.

Mr. SMOOT. There will be no misunderstanding. I know that the question came up, and I really do not know how it was finally decided.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The record will be read, including the entire matter leading up to the unanimous-consent agreement.

The Reporter read as follows:

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I move that we take up Senate bill 6266.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator from Georgia that I am not opposed to his bill, because of the conditions in the cotton country; but if it is proposed to add to it an amendment relating to the grading and inspection of wheat and other small grains, I am utterly opposed to it, and shall have to oppose the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the Senator from Georgia and also the Senator from Texas, at least in the form of a suggestion, to the fact that to lay this bill before the Senate now on a motion would probably displace the unfinished business. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I have already obtained unanimous consent to temporarily lay aside the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair simply makes that suggestion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understood that the Senator from Texas asked unanimous consent simply to temporarily lay aside the trust bill, which was done. That being done, I asked that the cotton-warehouse bill be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the form of a motion?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I really thought the unanimous consent carried with it the taking up of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not think so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then I ask unanimous consent to take up Senate bill 6266.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that I shall make no objection if it is understood that there is no grain inspection or wheat inspection attached to the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope there will be no effort to have it done. I have no arrangement to attach it, and I hope no effort will be made to do it.

Mr. NELSON. I recognize the fact that conditions are different in the cotton country. You have no cotton warehouses. We have an abundance of grain warehouses in our country, and we do not want to complicate it with any legislation of that kind.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And the further difference exists that all the representatives from the cotton States agree on this bill, while the Senators from the grain States disagree. If the Senators from the grain States all agreed upon something they wished to ask, I should be glad to accept it; but with the Senators from the grain States disagreeing about it, I hope there will be no effort to add that measure to this one.

Mr. NELSON. I withdraw all objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 6266) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license cotton warehouses, and for other purposes.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I do not think that is an agreement. The Senator from Minnesota had a perfect right to be opposed to the grain bill, just as much as I have a right to be for it. The Senator from Georgia has made no unanimous-consent agreement nor asked anyone to make it, according to the record.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I sought to let it be understood that there was no agreement; that I hoped it would not be done, but there was no condition to prevent it from being done.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, I do not wish either to displace or to defeat this measure, because it is a meritorious one; but I do believe the millions of farmers all through the United States, who are engaged in raising grain, should have the benefit of this measure, if any benefit there be, and I believe it would be a benefit to them.

It is true, as the Senator from Minnesota has said, that we have a warehouse system now, in the West especially. We have public elevators, where our grain may be taken and either sold or stored; but I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that when the grain is taken to an elevator and stored it means that it is disposed of; that unless you make a contract with the elevator to keep it in a special bin, that grain will be sold. It immediately becomes an article of commerce. You can readily see the disadvantage to the farmer. In case of a large crop all the grain will be immediately placed upon the market, which always has a tendency to reduce prices.

If we could have the benefit of this measure, and let the grain be stored, the same as you are now proposing to store cotton, I believe it would be a commendable idea. I believe it is the right kind of idea, to help the man who is unable to help himself. We can always sell grain at some price, but we very often have to sell it for much less than it costs to produce it; and that is the reason why I want this law to apply to grain as well as to other products.

I know that in 9 years out of 10 the farmer who produces nothing but grain makes no profit unless he can do the work himself, unless he has his own labor. If he were to hire the labor to be done on his farm, he would not farm for very many years. There are many of us in the Western States who have farmed on a large scale, and we have kept books, and we know that it is not a profitable industry where you have to hire all the labor.

Why should we not take the precaution to protect the grain farmer as well as the cotton farmer and the tobacco farmer? The only men who have made the grain industry profitable for the last 50 years are the middlemen who are handling the crop. There is no time when a farmer can not take his grain to an elevator, either to be stored or to be sold, but he can not sell it at prices that are profitable to him. Under the provisions of the bill of the Senator from Georgia it would be possible to store this grain and not place it on the market, as we do now when we take it to the elevator. Under existing conditions and under the present system you might just as well sell as to store, because I make the statement here that as soon as the grain is stored in a public elevator that grain is resold and shipped out of that elevator.

I want to say that as soon as the pending amendment is disposed of I shall offer my amendment, in order to get it before the Senate. If it is voted down I shall still be glad to support the measure as it is offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to make a motion at this time with reference to a recess. I move that not later than 5.30 p. m. to-day the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock on Monday morning.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to say just a few words in closing.

This bill takes care of turpentine and tobacco, which are not necessities of life, whereas canned salmon is a food; and there are $50,000,000 worth of it produced by hard-working men and people who are absolutely without a market at this time. It is a meritorious proposition. I want that understood.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

RECESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate of the United States having heretofore entered an order that not later than 5.30 o'clock p. m. to-day it would take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. on Monday, and it appearing to the satisfaction of the presiding officer that the Sergeant at Arms is unable to obtain a quorum, the presiding officer declares the Senate in recess until 11 o'clock a. m. on Monday.

The Senate thereupon (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) took a recess until Monday, August 24, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, August 22, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art supremely great and glorious, pure and holy, just and merciful, pour out upon us abundantly the riches of Thy grace that our minds and hearts may be fully prepared to meet the duties and obligations of this day, that we may have at its close the consciousness of Thine approval, and to Thee we shall give all praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, I have been in attendance at this session of Congress every day. I have missed but one roll call, and that was because of being a pallbearer at the funeral of Gen. SHERWOOD'S wife. On next Tuesday the Democratic State convention will meet in Missouri, and it is made the duty of the nominees in that State to attend the convention and make a platform. At this time it is impossible for the Speaker of this House or Mr. ALEXANDER and several others from Missouri, because of important duties, to attend that convention. I believe they all feel, and have so expressed themselves to me, that I should attend. I desire to do so, if this House will grant me permission to be absent on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of next week. I therefore ask unanimous consent for leave of absence during that time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for leave of absence for three days of next week. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BUREAU OF WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table for present consideration the bill (S. 6857) to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war-risk insurance in the Treasury Department, an identical House bill being on the calendar of the House.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MANN. It is a Union Calendar bill and is not in order.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is the reason that I asked unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. MANN. I object.

WATER POWER ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The SPEAKER. Under the special rule the House will automatically resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideraton of the bill (H. R. 16673) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16673, with Mr. FITZGERALD in the chair.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, debate upon this section was closed by unanimous consent at the expiration of a certain time, and I desire to know the status of that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. FERRIS. Is that all the time that is left?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] a question. Just before the close of the debate on this section the other day the gentleman asked me if I would not consent to strike out of line 17 on page 10 of this bill the words "or other uses," and I objected to doing so.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My thought was at that time that, by striking out those words and leaving the others in, the legal maxim of the expression of one thing is the exclusion of the other would apply, and that it would very greatly limit and restrict the meaning intended. I want to ask the gentleman if his thought and my idea in the matter would not be better served if we should strike out all of the section after the word "water," in line 16? That is, strike out the words "used in irrigation or for municipal or other uses, or any vested right acquired thereunder."

That would leave the first four lines of that section, down to the word "water." I understand that the gentleman does not object to the expression in this section of a recognition of our water rights under the State law and does not deny our right to the control of waters as to appropriation and use and distribution under our State laws; but he objects to the specifying of "other uses," in addition to municipal and irrigation. "Other uses" would include domestic use, and any vested rights acquired might possibly be construed as applying only to heretofore, and would give a prior right to all appropriations under the Federal law hereafter. I thought that, unless the gentleman was intending by this bill to supersede our rights out there, by striking out all after the word "water" it would accomplish what he wants, if I correctly understand him, and at the same time accomplish what we of the West want to retain in the measure—that is, an express, safeguarding provision in the act that will obviate any question on this subject. That will eliminate those specifications in respect to municipal and irrigation and other uses, and let it read as follows:

SEC. 14. That nothing in this act shall be construed as affecting or intended to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of any State relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water.

If that would satisfy the gentleman, so far as I am concerned, as the author of this section in the bill, I do not see that it would materially weaken the bill, and yet it would be an express recognition of and specifically preserve our State water-rights laws under our constitution, and would make the Government and these water-power companies come in and acquire their water rights under our State laws the same as other people. In other words, the gentleman certainly does not want to give a monopoly of our waters to the water-power companies.

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. And if the gentleman does not want to do that, we of the West feel that that whole section ought to remain in the bill, but it looks to me as though, if we cut out all after the word "water," it would effectually prevent the water-power companies going out there and trying to ignore our local State laws and superior rights by virtue of a Federal act, and assert a priority that they have no right to, and endeavor to acquire a monopoly.

Nobody in this House wants to knowingly give the water-power companies provided for in this bill a monopoly of our waters, or let them come in there and violate vested rights. I feel that if we do not have a saving clause of that kind in this bill they will do, or try to do, that. Because they are prone to accord too much power and authority to a Federal law, and we must have a safeguarding provision in the bill to prevent big power companies from riding over us. I do not want them to have the power to go into the Federal courts and harass and defeat our own little or big users of water or irrigation companies. Our water users are not all large companies. Ninety-nine per cent of them are small companies or associations of farmers or individuals. I want to protect those little fellows against these great, enormous, big eastern power companies that will come in there and try to gobble up our water if we do not head them off by the language I have inserted in the bill. We are very much in earnest about this matter in that country, and we want to make sure that this will protect the little fellows as against the big ones. We want to safeguard them. That is all there is to it.

Mr. MANN. Now, so far as the State control of water, authorized control, of course we can not interfere with that anyhow.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Well, if we do not put in the bill something by way of an express disclaimer by Congress of what these power corporations may do, they will make us trouble. We feel that you ought not to give them a permit in any language which might be construed to supersede the vested rights of the people of that country; and if we put in that kind of a disclaimer it will save and protect our rights out there. If we do not, I fear it will make interminable trouble. I will never agree to jeopardize or undermine the birthright of the West to the use of our waters in our nonnavigable streams. It seems to me the gentleman ought not to want to give that power or the possibility of that power to the power companies. They are big enough to take care of themselves, without legislating specially in their behalf. I am willing to accept the above modification, but the section 14, as so modified, must stay in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Did not we have some time on this side?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. MANN. I thought we had some time over here and we did not use all the time.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The Chairman says not. Go ahead in my two minutes.

Mr. MANN. I was going to yield to the gentleman; that is all.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I trust the gentleman will consent to make that modification of his amendment. I think that that would do nothing more than the gentleman is willing to do, as I understand it.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will permit, after the colloquy on the last day we ran, I took the debate and talked to the Interior Department, and they feel a good deal as if the disclaimer does not do so much one way or the other.

They called attention to the fact that on page 5 of the reclamation act and on page 11 of the Hetch Hetchy act we struck at the same proposition, and they thought—and I have a letter to that effect—that if we struck out, as suggested by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR], all after the word "water," it would accomplish all the gentleman seeks to accomplish and still guard against that which some fear.

Mr. MANN. That may be correct. I have no desire, as far as I am concerned, to interfere with the ordinary control of the water in the States. On the other hand, I do not desire that the State shall have the power in subsequent legislation to interfere with the authority which we grant under this bill. It may be aimed absolutely at the lessees of the General Government——

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The lessees under this bill will have every power they are entitled to, they can come in on the same footing as the other water-right appropriators. Their rights will be both acquired and protected under the State law.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman wishes to offer an amendment striking out all of the section after the word "water," I will withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend section 14 by striking out all thereof after the word "water," in line 16, and insert a period after the word "water."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 10, by striking out all of section 14 after the word "water," in line 16.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Colorado yield to me?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman from Colorado strikes out too much. I think the words at the end of that section, "or any vested right acquired thereunder," should remain in the bill. I think it is highly important.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My thought, I will say to the gentleman from Wyoming, is that this will leave the section much broader than it now is. If you leave in "or any vested right acquired thereunder" I am afraid you are limiting and narrowing the meaning of the fore part of the section.

Mr. MONDELL. On the contrary, I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the first part of the section is a simple disclaimer. The words at the end of the section, which I think should remain in, are a saving clause. I doubt if we can take away a vested right, and yet there are provisions in this act as it stands which, if they could be enforced as they are written, would interfere with vested rights.

I think the repealing clause of the bill would jeopardize vested rights. Therefore, it strikes me you ought not to take from the bill a provision now in which it is intended to protect vested rights, that should be in addition to the general disclaimer with regard to the State jurisdiction over water.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will state to the gentleman that the attorneys in the Interior Department ran the question down for the committee, and they state that, if we put in a disclaimer affecting or of any intention to affect or to in any way interfere with the laws of the State relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of the waters of our streams, it would be enough and even more than is necessary to protect our rights.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the gentleman of the opinion that some one down at the department knows more about it than he does?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I think the gentleman knows I do not rely upon the department officials any more than he does. At the same time I am often glad to have their judgment, whether I follow it or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment. I offer the following amendment, to strike out in lines 16 and 17 the words "used in irrigation or for municipal or other uses."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have not any objection if that is satisfactory to let it go in, but it seems to me that it is not in order——

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming is not in order as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Colorado offered an amendment to strike out two provisions of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado moves to strike out all of section 10, after the word "water," in line 16.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, I move to amend that by only striking out after the word "water" the words "used in irrigation or for municipal or other uses." In other words, I only strike out half of what the gentleman strikes out.

Mr. MANN. While I am not in favor of the amendment, the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming is merely to perfect the text of the provision which the gentleman from Colorado proposes to strike out, and hence would be in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming moves to strike out from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado the words which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the words, in lines 16 and 17, "used in irrigation or for municipal or other uses."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this section has been closed by unanimous consent. The noes had it.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think the ayes had an opportunity to vote.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will ask the Chairman to state that over again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair put the question.

Mr. MONDELL. I was endeavoring to get the attention of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not think the gentleman was endeavoring to get the Chair's attention. The question now is on the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members are present, a quorum. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That all acts or parts of acts providing for the use of the lands of the United States for any of the purposes to which this act is applicable are hereby repealed to the extent only of any conflict with this act: Provided, however, That the provisions of the act of February 15, 1901 (31 Stat. L., 790), shall continue in full force and effect as to lands within the Yosemite, Sequoia, and General Grant National Parks in the State of California: And provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not be construed as revoking or affecting any permits or valid existing rights of way heretofore given or granted pursuant to law, but at the option of the permittee any permit heretofore given for the development, generation, transmission, or utilization of hydroelectric power may be surrendered and the permittee given a lease for the same premises under the provisions of this act.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

This section repeals a considerable number of statutes; just how many no one knows. It became very clear during the hearings that no one knew just what the effect of this repeal of conflicting statutes would be. It is certain that it repeals the provision of the act of February 1, 1905—I think it is—under which are obtained rights of way within forest reserves for mining and municipal purposes. It also repeals the act of May 11, 1898, supplemental to the act of 1891, under which water power may be developed subsidiary to development for purposes of irrigation. It will also repeal the act of March 4, 1911, so far as it affects rights of way for the transmission and distribution of electrical power, and the repeal of that act, in view of the provisions of this act, would be a very serious matter. For instance, a going enterprise, one already built, in the State of California, for instance, now under control of the public-service commission of the State and paying 4 per cent to the State, might desire to extend a transmission line over a strip of public land. That could be done now under the act of March 4, 1911, under a 50-year franchise and without changing the status of the enterprise; but when you repeal that statute by this enactment, and such a company should seek such a right of way, its entire plant and all of its operations would be brought under the provisions of the act before us. It might be taken out of the control of the State; it certainly would if it had a line running into another State. It might, under the terms of this bill, and probably would, have a horsepower charge laid on the entire project and enterprise. I do not pretend to say whether the State could still continue to levy its charge or not. If it did, the enterprise would be paying a double tax on its water-power development simply because it was compelled to cross a strip of public land with a pole line. I think the astute gentlemen from the department who had so much to do with the preparation of this bill understand what its effect would be under the circumstances I have mentioned. No doubt they would be glad to get projects already built under their complete control in that way, as they evidently desire to control the power development supplemental and subsidiary to irrigation enterprises. They have evidently put a joker over on the committee.

The acts referred to should remain on the statute books. Just how it affects other acts no one knows. I am sure there is not a member of the committee—and I credit the gentlemen with knowing a good deal about their bill—who has any clear idea concerning it.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. How can the gentleman figure out that this repeals the irrigation act referred to?

Mr. MONDELL. Why, during the hearing some one suggested it would repeal that supplemental irrigation act, and the gentleman who was appearing before the committee for the department, Mr. Wells, I think it was, said that is what they wanted to do. Of course, that repeals those two acts, and I do not know how many more.

Mr. RAKER. The original bill contained a repeal of all acts. That was entirely eliminated, and this proviso now is intended to leave in full force and effect all the acts referred to by the gentleman, and it only repeals any law that relates to the generation of electric energy.

Mr. MONDELL. It repeals unquestionably——

Mr. RAKER. The attorney for the department——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman has taken most of my time. If I can get more time I will be glad to yield.

Mr. RAKER. I am satisfied we can get more time for the gentleman. The first clause says:

That all acts or parts of acts providing for the use of the lands of the United States for any of the purposes for which this act is applicable are hereby repealed to the extent only of any conflict with this act.

That was gone over by the committee and the law officers of the department, so as to leave in full force and effect all the acts that the gentleman refers to, and it only affects the act of 1901 in regard to the question of reservoir rights, and so forth, for the purpose of preparing to generate electric energy.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman, if he will listen to me for a moment——

Mr. RAKER. Surely I will.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). I think will have to agree with me that it unquestionably repeals the provision of law which provides for the development of power supplemental and subsidiary to irrigation development, because it repeals everything that has to do with the development of hydroelectric power, and that is precisely what that act does, and it does nothing else. So it clearly repeals that, and your committee had before it an official of the department who said that that was their object and intent.

Now, as to the act of 1905, which was a part of the law which transferred the forest reserves—that is, the water and power portion of it—there may be some question as to whether or no the provisions of that act, the power and water provisions, are repealed, but it is doubtful at best, and the probability is that it is modified. But there can be no question——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman can make a statement of two minutes in my time and ask a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I thank the gentleman. I do not wish to take the gentleman's time. I think the gentleman from California has the same view of this matter as I have. I do not believe he wants to repeal the particular act to which I have referred; that is, the act which provides for power development in connection with plants having a right of way under the act of 1891. But I think that the act clearly does that. And let me say further to the gentleman that had the committee supported my amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] there would not have been any question about this, because there would then have been a provision in the bill expressly protecting vested rights. But the committee insisted on refusing to protect vested rights. The committee had protected vested rights in the bill as it reported it. Then a member of the committee comes on the floor and offers an amendment which takes away all protection from every vested right that has been acquired. So far as those vested rights can be affected by this bill, they are swept aside. They have no standing. I do not know to what extent they can be affected, but so far as this bill can affect them, by your action, by your refusal to perfect that amendment, you have swept away whatever protection you had in the vested rights.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the gentleman read the last section of the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It provides that it "shall not be construed as revoking or affecting any permits or valid existing rights of way heretofore given or granted pursuant to law," and so forth.

Mr. MONDELL. That has nothing to do, as the gentleman from Texas should know, with the first proposition I referred to, and that is the repeal of, the law. While that might save certain classes of rights, the repeal of the laws will prevent the granting in the future of certain classes of rights, such as are needed for power purposes on irrigation projects. I do not think the committee wants to make the irrigationists come under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the original draft of the bill and also some amendments that were presented did in substance repeal, or attempt to repeal, all laws relating to the water situation—irrigation, mining, and so forth. The committee was unanimous upon that question, that none of the laws in relation to irrigation, none of the laws relating to the development of water in the national forests or on the public domain, should be repealed. They wanted them all to remain in force and effect, and the matter was taken up with the Department of the Interior, with the attorney for the Department of the Interior, and also with the officers of the Forest Service, and was thoroughly thrashed out.

Now, I am just as strong in favor of keeping upon the statute books the present law in relation to the development of water, ditches, the right of irrigation, the right of the miner for his mill and any other development that he might make, as the gentleman from Wyoming is, and this was drawn with the express purpose that it would apply only to hydroelectric development, and all other laws should remain in full force and effect.

Now, what the gentleman refers to is this: There is an act which permits a man to have ditches and reservoirs for agricultural work and other purposes, and incidentally it may permit the development of these water plants for hydroelectric purposes. The two departments—the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture—have held up a great many applications upon the ground that they could not tell which one was the more important, and that, so far as the law related to joint action, they ought to be separated. In other words, they say this statute ought to apply solely and exclusively to the development of hydroelectric energy, and for that purpose only, but all other laws on the statute book and any others that might be necessary should be in full force and effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. DONOVAN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from California may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from California a question in reference to the provision in the bill continuing in full force the law relating to certain parks in California. I have examined the act of February 15, 1901. What are the provisions of that act which it is contended shall remain in full force and effect and which conflict with the provisions of this act?

Mr. RAKER. The provisions of that act are as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized and empowered, under general regulations to be fixed by him, to permit the use of rights of way through the public lands, forest and other reservations of the United States, and the Yosemite, Sequoia, and General Grant National Parks, Cal., for electrical plants, poles, and lines for the generation and distribution of electrical power, and for telephone and telegraph purposes, and for canals, ditches, pipes and pipe lines, flumes, tunnels, or other water conduits, and for water plants, dams, and reservoirs used to promote irrigation or mining or quarrying, or the manufacturing or cutting of timber or lumber, or the supplying of water for domestic, public, or any other beneficial uses to the extent of the ground occupied by such canals, ditches, flumes, tunnels, reservoirs, or other water conduits or water plants, or electrical or other works permitted hereunder, and not to exceed 50 feet on each side of the marginal limits thereof, or not to exceed 50 feet on each side of the center line of such pipes and pipe lines, electrical, telegraph, and telephone lines and poles, by any citizen, association, or corporation of the United States, where it is intended by such to exercise the use permitted hereunder, or any one or more of the purposes herein named: Provided, That such permits shall be allowed within or through any of said parks, or any forest, military, Indian, or other reservation only upon the approval of the chief officer of the department under whose supervision such park or reservation falls, and upon a finding by him that the same is not incompatible with the public interest: Provided further, That all permits given hereunder for telegraph and telephone purposes shall be subject to the provision of title 65 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and amendments thereto, regulating rights of way for telegraph companies over the public domain: And provided further, That any permission given by the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of this act may be revoked by him or his successor, in his discretion, and shall not be held to confer any right or easement, or interest in, to, or over any public land, reservation, or park.

The committee view is that that act ought to remain as it is, and there ought to be a revocable permit, as there is now.

Mr. MANN. That law does not conflict in any way with this, does it?

Mr. RAKER. Not in any way.

Mr. MANN. Then this is put in out of excess of caution?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; this is put in out of excess of caution, as a precaution. We did not want to interfere with the parks. If anybody gets a right to a park, he must get it by special act of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Is there not a similar provision with relation to other parks?

Mr. RAKER. No; there is no similar provision which relates to those parks. Those are the only ones, with the exception of Mount Rainier. There is no right given to the Secretary of the Interior or to the Secretary of Agriculture such as is given in the case of the Yosemite and the three parks named here—the Yosemite, the Sequoia, and the General Grant.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section at the end of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Add as a new section, to be known as section 16:

"That this act shall not apply to navigation dams or structures under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War or the Chief of Engineers, or to lands purchased or acquired by condemnation by the United States or withdrawn by the President under the act approved June 25, 1910, entitled 'An act to authorize the President of the United States to make withdrawals of public lands in certain cases where such lands were purchased or acquired by condemnation or withdrawn by the President for the sole purpose of promoting navigation.'"

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I presume that the committee can determine what the amendment is by hearing it read. But in a word it is an agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of War, and in a word it is a disclaimer in this bill, so to speak, of any intention by the provisions of this bill to in any way invade the jurisdiction that comes under the Adamson bill in the War Department or of the Chief of Engineers. As is known, dams of all kinds in navigable waters come under the jurisdiction of the War Department. The House has recently passed a bill on that subject, and the amendment offered here is in consequence of an agreement made between the Secretaries that we shall not invade either jurisdiction. I hope the House will adopt the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report section 8.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HAY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Platt, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had excused Mr. SWANSON from further service as a conferee on the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system, and had appointed Mr. BANKHEAD in his place.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7967) to amend the act approved June 25, 1910, authorizing a postal savings system.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had approved bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

On August 15, 1914:

S. 4966. An act proposing an amendment as to section 19 of the Federal reserve act relating to reserves, and for other purposes;

S. 5313. An act to regulate the taking or catching of sponges in the waters of the Gulf of Mexico and the Straits of Florida outside of State jurisdiction; the landing, delivering, curing, selling, or possession of the same; providing means of enforcement of the same, and for other purposes; and

S. 6031. An act authorizing the Board of Trade of Texarkana, Ark.-Tex., to construct a bridge across Sulphur River at or near Pace's ferry, between the counties of Bowie and Cass, in the State of Texas.

On August 16, 1914:

S. 110. An act to tax the privilege of dealing on exchanges, boards of trade, and similar places in contracts of sale of cotton for future delivery, and for other purposes.

On August 20, 1914:

S. J. Res. 178. Joint resolution granting authority to the American Red Cross to charter a ship or ships of foreign register for the transportation of nurses and supplies and for all uses in connection with the work of that society.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That for the occupancy and use of lands and other property of the United States permitted under this act the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to specify in the lease and to collect charges or rentals for all power developed and sold or used by the lessee for any purpose other than the operation of the plant, and the proceeds shall be paid into, reserved, and appropriated as a part of the reclamation fund created by the act of Congress approved June 17, 1902, known as the reclamation act, and after use thereof in the construction of reclamation works and upon return to the reclamation fund of any such moneys in the manner provided by the reclamation act and acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, 50 per cent of the amounts so utilized in and returned to the reclamation fund shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury after the expiration of each fiscal year to the State within the boundaries of which the hydroelectric power or energy is generated and developed, said moneys to be used by such State for the support of public schools or other educational institutions or for the construction of public improvements, or both, as the legislature of the State may direct: Provided, That leases for the development of power by municipal corporations solely for municipal use shall be issued without rental charge, and that leases for development of power not in excess of 25 horsepower may be issued to individuals or associations for domestic, mining, or irrigation use without such charge.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "into," in line 4, on page 7, strike out the remainder of the section and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to ask the gentleman if he has any objection to the discussion of an amendment which naturally comes before his amendment, as it has to do with the general question of the amount of the rentals?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. No; I have no objection if my amendment is pending.

Mr. MONDELL. I have an amendment changing the amount and character of the rentals.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. If the gentleman's amendment is to the part of the section which is not stricken out by my amendment, then the gentleman's amendment might be offered afterwards.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the logical way would be to offer the amendment to the first part of the section first; but of course I do not insist if the gentleman has any objection to it. It occurred to me that if we could first discuss the amount and character of these rentals, we could then discuss the disposition of the proceeds more intelligently.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. If the gentleman will allow me, I do not think the amount of the charge will affect the disposition of it at all. The principle is not affected by the amount of money that may be involved in the charge.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FERRIS. How much time does the gentleman think we should consume on this section?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Personally I have no information as to how much time. I will want to occupy probably 10 minutes, not exceeding that, myself.

Mr. FERRIS. Has the gentleman any intimation as to others who may want time?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; I think there are several other gentlemen who may likely want some time on it.

Mr. FERRIS. Would it be the judgment of the gentleman that 30 minutes on a side would be sufficient?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. So far as I am personally concerned.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that at the end of one hour debate be closed on this amendment and all amendments thereto, and that one-half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] and one-half by myself for the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

Mr. FERRIS. Will not the gentleman wait until we get this unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. MANN. I think we will probably want more time than the gentleman indicates.

Mr. FERRIS. What is the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. MANN. I think we ought to let the debate run a little while, in order to find out how much time may be desired. We probably will not do anything else to-day.

Mr. FERRIS. I have no disposition to cut off debate.

Mr. MANN. I understand.

Mr. FERRIS. But the gentleman knows that the debate gets very far afield sometimes, unless we have some control of it. Would the gentleman indicate how much time—an hour and a half?

Mr. MANN. I think we will get along better if we do not make any agreement in advance. Several gentlemen have indicated a desire to be heard on this proposition.

Mr. FERRIS. I withhold the request.

Mr. MANN. I think it is well to withhold it for a while. If there is any trouble, we can reach an agreement later.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the section, a portion of which the gentleman from North Carolina proposes to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will see that the rights of the gentleman from Wyoming with reference to his amendment are protected.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this section of the bill provides that of the proceeds arising from the rental of these water powers on the public domain, 50 per cent of the amount shall be paid into the reclamation fund and the remaining 50 per cent shall be turned over to the State in which the improvement is made, for appropriation by that State under the direction of its legislature, either for educational purposes or for public improvements.

We have recently passed through this House and through the Congress a general water-power act applying to the navigable streams of the country. Of course these navigable streams are located in the various States, and there was no suggestion made by any gentleman upon this floor that any part of the rental received by the Government from the construction of these hydroelectric plants on navigable streams should be diverted either to the necessary work of the improvement of rivers and harbors or to the State in which the development was made. That proposition would have been on all fours with the proposition laid down in this bill to turn over to the reclamation fund 50 per cent of the rentals in the public-land States and the other 50 per cent to the States in which these improvements are made.

My amendment strikes out this provision and declares that the rentals derived from the construction of hydroelectric plants on the public domain shall be turned into the Treasury as "miscellaneous receipts." I am sometimes impressed that certain gentlemen representing that great country in the West have persuaded themselves that the public domain lying within the bounds of the States that they represent belongs to them and not to the people of the whole country. The public lands are the property of the whole people of the United States, and not the property of the States in which they are located.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Does the gentleman know that the public lands in these Western States to which this act applies have already been appropriated to the reclamation fund?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; I know that the proceeds from the sale of the lands have been appropriated, and I was going to say that we have already, under the reclamation act of 1892 and amendments thereto, appropriated to the reclamation projects in the West a sum of money two and a half times as great as anybody prophesied would be received from the sale of public lands at the time of the passage of the act, reaching now approximately $80,000,000 without interest, to the people who come in under reclamation projects.

We have recently passed through this House a bill extending the time of these loans under the reclamation projects for 10 years—possibly 20 years—to these people without interest. That is only an argument in favor of my proposition, and whatever obligation we may have been under to turn the proceeds of the public lands over for local purposes, we have not only met in legislation in the past and in the amount of money turned into this channel, but we have far exceeded any obligation resting upon the people as a whole.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. COX. Is it not true that in most of the Western States, where reservations are made, from 25 to 50 per cent of the money derived from the sale of timber goes to educational purposes?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes; instead of going into the Treasury of the United States as "miscellaneous receipts," as proceeds from the sale of property, 35 to 50 per cent of the money is diverted and appropriated to the State in which the reservation may lie for the benefit of that State; of course, upon the theory that these lands have been withdrawn and are not subject to taxation within the State. But I am not ready, for one, to commit myself to this policy as being a good one. I think we have gone not only far enough but too far in this direction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. We might as well, it seems to me, have provided in the general dam act, which we passed recently, that 50 per cent of the rentals of the water powers on navigable streams should be placed in a fund for the improvement of the river on which the power was generated, and that the other 50 per cent should go into a fund for the State in which the plant was located for the uses of the State for educational purposes. I think it would be just as logical if I was to come here and ask the Congress of the United States to pass a law to the effect that 50 per cent of the income tax collected from the citizens in my State should be placed to the credit and control of my State for educational purposes, or that half the customs receipts received in the port of New York might be diverted to State purposes.

We have gone absolutely wild in the appropriation of public money to local purposes, but it is time, it seems to me, that we should divert this money and turn it back into the Treasury of all the people for the uses of all the people. I am not unfriendly to that great section of the country known as the West. I have voted for measures peculiarly beneficial to that section, and I am ready yet to do it, but I think these gentlemen should not come here and ask those of us who come from every other section of this great country to surrender all our rights in the great domain that is the common property of us all in this western empire.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman concede that North Carolina got every foot of public land in his State in the beginning?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. North Carolina was one of the original thirteen States, and there was never much public land in it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. But your people got the entire benefit of the public lands that were in North Carolina.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Such as there was, which was very small; a very limited area.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is only what these gentlemen of the West are asking for.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Rather than that the State should take all these lands by piecemeal I would support a measure that would turn over to them every foot of public land within their State borders. [Applause.] I do not believe in taking it in this way, and I had rather go the whole length than to admit by our legislation here the right of the States in the West to have the benefit that accrues from the location of the public domain within the borders of those States.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I know that the gentleman from North Carolina would do nothing to array the West against the East or the East against the West.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I have no purpose of doing any such thing.

Mr. FERRIS. But does not the gentleman think that when Congress has appropriated for rivers and harbors, and so forth, for the East $753,916,446.61 that they never expect to get back, and also an appropriation in a bill that carries $5,000,000—does he not think that the equities are not so bad as compared with the total amount given to reclamation of $70,000,000, every cent of which is to come back?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Oh, I am not going to differentiate between a tax and a pork barrel. The gentleman knows that the appropriations for rivers and harbors have been made to aid commerce, to bring a benefit not only to the people of the East but to the country at large.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Does not the gentleman realize that every acre of land that is made habitable in the West simply benefits the whole country; that we buy everything we use out there from people in the East and the South, and that every home established there benefits the whole country?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I do not often ask for time, but I would like five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, in reply to my friend, I am rather surprised that the gentleman from Colorado should have injected that proposition into my speech. I would like to ask him if this bill, making a contribution of 50 per cent, is going to make another homestead in his State?

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It is going to make a great many hundreds of them.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. No. The building of these water powers may do it, but where the proceeds go will not affect in the slightest degree the number of people who settle there.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. It helps to complete these reclamation projects, it helps to reclaim the arid lands, and it makes homes for the people and schools for the people.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yielded to the gentleman for a question—not for a speech.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I was just trying to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, there might be some criticism made if I were disposed to make criticism of the West, but I want to deny any such intention upon my part. I am not here in an effort to arraign one section of the country against another, nor am I here to arraign one interest against another; but there ought to be some equity in legislation here as between the different sections of this country and the different representatives of the different sections. A great many of us are going to be confronted—in fact, all of us are likely to be confronted in the near future, and we are confronted now—with a demand for legislation along the line of rural credits. The great agricultural classes of this country are asking that they be placed on a par with the commercial interests in their ability to secure money for the financing of their business. That is up to most of us. I am here personally representing a great agricultural district, with nearly 300,000 people in it, with a territory large enough to be made a State, and larger than some States in the American Union. Those people are agricultural people, and they are clamoring, and constantly clamoring, for some relief from the condition in which they find themselves. I think they ought to have it; but when they come to me as their Representative and we offer them in a rural credit bill opportunity to secure money from the National Treasury, in some way, at an interest rate of 3 or 4 or 5 per cent, they immediately say to us, "You have placed in the great West, for the development of land in that country and agricultural interests, $80,000,000 without interest." Tell me how I am going to answer that, some of you gentlemen, when you take the floor. It simply can not be answered, and I believe—I know—that many of us must very soon answer that question. If I were disposed to, I might criticize the expenditures of the money under the Reclamation Service for the things for which they have spent it and the returns they have gotten; but I have not the time now, and at some future time, possibly, I may enter into that.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. For a question.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Do I understand the gentleman to favor a proposition that would allow the Federal Government to construct a power plant in the State of North Carolina and take the receipts of that plant from the people of that State and put a portion of them into the Federal Treasury?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman understands me exactly, if that plant be constructed on lands of the Government in the State of North Carolina, and the Federal Government has recently acquired land there.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. No matter whether the land had been improved or not, but simply because it possesses certain natural advantages for that particular purpose?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. If it belongs to the National Government and it has acquired it and it improves it by the construction of a water-power plant under this bill, I believe the proceeds from that plant should go into the Treasury.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I am surprised that a statement of that kind should come from a gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It has come; and I want to say that there is now a proposition at another place in that State of North Carolina, and the people ask that a certain part of the proceeds that may be derived from it shall go into the treasury of that State; but I stand here and now to say that I am opposed to it and will oppose it if it comes to this body. It belongs to the National Government, and the National Government has paid for it, and it is its right to have any revenues that may be derived from that land located in my State. I believe the same as to the land that belongs to the Government in the State of California, in the State of New Mexico, or in any other State in the West where there are public lands.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. How does the gentleman justify the fact that there are $1,433,757.39 held by the State of North Carolina, money of the United States, since 1836, upon which it has paid no interest?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I justify that because by an act of Congress this money was paid back to those States, and to all of the States then in the Union, and that is justification enough to satisfy me, whether it pleases the gentleman or not.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But it was to be repaid?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Has the United States Government ever taken any action to recover this fund?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But the money is due.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Certainly it is due, but the United States Government has never seriously expected it to be refunded, and it has never tried to have it refunded.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. And the State of North Carolina is not paying any interest on it.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Certainly not. It was turned over to the State——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has again expired.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I shall not at this time ask for further time, but I hope that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, there are two extreme views in this House and over the country in regard to water-power legislation. There are those, like the gentleman who has just preceded me, who believe that the public lands of the United States are to be considered solely as an asset of the Government; that we should treat them as a private proprietor would and obtain the utmost possible revenue out of them for the benefit of the Federal Treasury. If we follow that theory, of course the gentleman from North Carolina is correct. Fortunately we have adopted a different policy in all the history of our public-land legislation since the beginning of this Government. We have given away 140,000,000 acres of the public domain under the homestead law merely on condition that the entryman go upon the land and make a home. We have acted upon the theory that freeholders make better citizens than tenants. We have treated the public domain as a trust estate held for the benefit of those entitled to enter it, and that it should be so disposed of as to carry the greatest comfort and the maximum happiness to the greatest number of people.

As a consequence of this wise policy we have the most stable government in the world to-day. If there had been a homestead law in Mexico there would be no landless peons to engage in revolutions. Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri, stated the true doctrine when he said:

> The freeholder is the natural supporter of a free government. We are a Republic, and we wish to continue so; then multiply the class of freeholders, pass the public lands cheaply and easily into the hands of the people, sell for a reasonable price to those who are able to pay, and give without price to those who are not.

We have not only given away these millions of acres under the homestead laws, but we have donated other millions of acres to railroad companies to promote the construction of transcontinental lines.

If we can dispose of public land without price on behalf of the general welfare, then we can use the proceeds from the sale of such land in the same way; that is to say, we can consider all money obtained in this manner as the private purse of the Nation and use it for the public good.

For years we have devoted a part of the receipts from the sale of public lands to the support of agricultural colleges in the different States. Since 1902 the remainder of this money has been set aside as a reclamation fund to develop the arid West. If the money received from the sales of public lands now goes into the reclamation fund, certainly we can not logically refuse to place in the same fund moneys received from the rentals of public lands. The theory is the same in both cases and the use of the money in this way can be amply justified.

Why did we create the reclamation fund? In order that large areas of the public lands in the West might be irrigated, thereby making homes for thousands of our citizens. The reclamation law is based on the same theory as the homestead law and merits our support for the same reasons.

Now, let us look at the other extreme view on this question.

At their conference at Denver on April 9, 1914, the governors of the States of Utah, Nevada, Colorado, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Wyoming, New Mexico, and North Dakota adopted the following resolution:

> Whereas Congress has declared the water of all lakes, rivers, and other sources of water supply upon the public lands, and not navigable, shall remain and be held free for the appropriation and use of the public for irrigation, mining, and manufacturing purposes, we insist the Federal Government has no authority to exercise control over the water of a State through ownership of public lands:
> Resolved, We maintain the waters of a State belong to the people of the State, and that the State should be left free to develop water-power possibilities and receive fully the revenues and other benefits derived from said developments.

In a memorandum submitted by the western governors to the Committee on the Public Lands this statement is made:

> But the States can not surrender the principle involved in the declaration of their governors. To do so would be to acknowledge their inequality with the original States in opposition to the equality guaranteed by the Constitution and by the acts of their admission; it would be to surrender without consideration one of their greatest resources; it would be to admit the right of the Federal Government to tax their resources and their people for the benefit of the whole Nation, when the people of other States are not likewise taxed.

The western governors insist that since the States own the water which the United States proposes to use to generate electric power Congress should let this land pass into private ownership, in order that the States may tax these power plants and obtain revenue for the maintenance of the State governments. By State control of the use of the water they have the ability to regulate the charges made for hydroelectric power

With such divergent views a compromise is absolutely necessary. In discussing the attitude of the western governors, the Secretary of the Interior said at the hearings:

> Then they said: "You want to exploit the West on behalf of the East, and make the West support the East. Here we have an internal State, without any seaboard, paying for a large Navy and for the support of the Army, and carrying on large expenditures in which we have no direct interest. Yet you come right into our State, where we have water power, or coal, or oil, and want to take that wealth away from the State and lodge it in the United States Treasury. Those are the things we will not stand for; we will not stand for the enriching of the East at the expense of the West."
> We have met that. We have met that by allowing all of the money to be used for the development of the West, and when it is returned from the reclamation fund one-half is to go directly into the treasury of the State.

And so we have agreed upon this section, which is satisfactory to all concerned.

The conservationists who are interested in this legislation are satisfied, because the question of regulation appeals to them. This bill provides for Federal or State regulation of the use of all water power on the public domain. That is the big thing that they are concerned about. They consider the revenue that may be received to be a minor matter. The people of the West will be satisfied because we propose to follow the precedent established in dividing the money received from the national forests.

The forest reserves being Federal property, the States can not levy taxes on the lands or the timber. The law now provides that 35 per cent of the net receipts from the forests shall go to the State in lieu of taxes for the support of public schools and public roads. We have new and growing communities which require money. If we let the title to these power sites remain forever in the Federal Government and the States are not permitted to tax the values that will be created, how can you expect us to have great States as you have here in the East? The Western States are entitled to some revenue from these lands to support their governments. Remember that all money received from rentals does not go to the States. For 20 years it is to be used in the reclamation of arid lands, and after that the money is divided—one half to the State for school and road purposes and the other half to remain permanently in the reclamation fund. Thus we have compromised this question between these two radical schools of thought, and unless we do agree to this compromise I am confident we will never obtain any water-power development on the public domain. Those who have stood on both sides of the question have agreed upon this legislation. It is fair and just to all concerned, and I sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina will not prevail.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] will not prevail; but nevertheless the provisions of the bill will be a little difficult for men from the public-land States to defend. I had hoped, before the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina was offered, to get an opportunity to offer an amendment relating to the character of these charges to be laid on these enterprises, but that opportunity was denied me. If the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina does not carry, I propose to offer an amendment to this particular provision relating to the distribution of the funds, as well as one relating to the character of the charges. The gentleman from North Carolina argues from a curious and exceedingly old-fashioned standpoint. There has not been a time since we made the distribution of public-land funds, to which the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE] called attention, that we have not considered proceeds from the sale of public lands other than as a general improvement fund, and in 1902 we dedicated all the proceeds from the sale of public lands into the reclamation fund.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman has not lost sight of the fact that it is all to come back from the sale of public lands, from the reclamation of the lands, has he?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no; I have not.

Mr. PAYNE. That was the agreement at the time.

Mr. MONDELL. I have not lost sight of that, and I do not think anyone else has—that it has to be returned in the long run. They are not like river and harbor funds, a large portion of which are sunk in bogs and quagmires along the coast that never can be utilized for commerce, and some of them spent on rivers in Texas that ought to be macadamized rather than dredged.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Is it not possible, from the gentleman's point of view, that any part of this reclamation fund has been sunk in bogs and quagmires that will not get back into the National Treasury?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think so to any appreciable extent. As far as they have been spent a greater proportion of it will be paid back beyond question, and it is entirely proper. It is in accordance with the time-honored policy of all parties, let me say to my friend, to utilize the proceeds of the sale of public lands, not as a general fund in the Treasury, but as a fund to be dedicated for development purposes, or to be returned, a part of it, to the State, as ought to be done in this case, in lieu of the taxes which they would otherwise receive.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman does not overlook the fact that in all of these public-land States of the West a certain number of sections of public lands were donated to the States in former times. Is not that true?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, that is true, and very properly so. We are simply following now the policy which was laid down a good many years ago, and never departed from by anybody of any party, so far as the proceeds of public lands were concerned, by dedicating them, except the 5 per cent which goes to the State in lieu of taxes, to great works of improvement. In 1902 we dedicated them for the purpose of increasing the cultivated area of the country, and thus the output of agricultural products, and thus reducing the high cost of living.

The gentleman's party claims to be anxious to reduce the cost of living, and yet the gentleman offers an amendment which takes away from the fund which more than any other fund under the flag has to do with the reduction of the cost of living by increasing the amount of foodstuffs in the country. The gentleman is not logical. He is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am also a member, and he is getting the Appropriation Committee view of things to an extent that has somewhat, it seems to me, drawn him away from his former reasonable and proper moorings as a Democrat and led him to insist that we shall take the proceeds of these lands out in the Western States and utilize them in far-distant portions of the country.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. "The gentleman from North Carolina" may, in the mind of the gentleman from Wyoming, be illogical in the position he has taken, but "the gentleman from North Carolina" can address himself to a subject of this kind without injecting into it partisan politics, while the gentleman from Wyoming seems unable to discuss any question without the injection of politics.

Mr. MONDELL. Quite the contrary. I have injected no partisan politics. I have called attention to the fact that there is no partisan politics in it. I have called attention to the fact that it has been the policy of all parties, Republican and Democratic alike, to utilize these proceeds from the sale and disposition of public lands for purposes for which this bill proposes to utilize them. The gentleman has departed from the policy of his party. It is not partisan on my part to chide the gentleman for departing from the pure principles of Democracy; that is not partisan.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I would rather be chided by other gentlemen than the gentleman from Wyoming.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the proposition suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] is one of a good deal of interest, it is true; but the unfairness of the suggestion, I believe, can be illustrated from some of the remarks of the gentleman from North Carolina. He suggested that most of these rivers were within the States which were involved in the recent Adamson dam bill that we passed and that we had provided for a charge there. Now, most of the rivers involved in that case formed State lines and are boundaries between States, and there is the difficulty as to charge involved. But while we were discussing that bill the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] especially referred to North Carolina. He stated that a body of French capitalists, as I remember, had gone into that State and had established a dam site on one of the streams, which was temporarily nonnavigable, for the manufacture of aluminum, and that they had been told to go within the State and take those rights, because they would avoid the paying of any sum whatever into the National Treasury, as they might have to do in some other river over which the National Government had jurisdiction. So the matter of charge within the State of North Carolina is eliminated. They get nothing from the development of a stream there or a power plant put upon a stream within the State lines of North Carolina, and the Government gets nothing, and yet we of the West have to contribute and pay large sums of money, as has already been illustrated, for the building up and improving of the streams of North Carolina.

It was suggested all through the debate on the Adamson dam bill, and as to the charge which we succeeded in putting into the bill, that the money was to be used right there on the stream in the improving of navigation, and the navigation of this country is taken care of from the General Treasury, whereas these reclamation projects are taken care of from that particular reclamation fund. And I think the condition is analogous. I think the situation is practically the same on that particular point. I remember down in Louisiana, where the public domain was going and going, until it was all taken up by gentlemen from Michigan and gentlemen from Louisiana and gentlemen from other States. It was taken and absorbed, and now the Federal Government has nothing down there. But the State of Louisiana collects taxes from the lands.

In the State of North Carolina we have no interest whatever—that is, the Federal Government has not, except where we bought some public lands, as I understand—and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] very graciously suggests that when we go into North Carolina and buy land, that then we acquire all these rights and we can do what we please with the revenues from the land that we buy. But that is a different situation from this public land to-day in the great West that has been heretofore given over to a great extent to the States when the States were admitted to the Union. And I think that from the standpoint of development, or from the standpoint of proper use of the money, the revenue produced under this bill ought to be used locally, and that the amendment ought not to prevail.

The gentleman said that he would rather give all of it to the State than to allow a portion of it to be taken. He thought it would be better policy to give it all over, and some one applauded the proposition. But we have not followed that kind of a policy. In other States all of it has gone. The Federal Government has nothing, but out there vast interests are held by the Government and these revenues ought to be spent locally as near as possible. The public has an interest in the coal lands of Pennsylvania to the extent of the right to tax those lands, but where does this public asset go? To the State as every one knows, and so in North Carolina and in every other State. This money that goes into the reclamation fund is only loaned. It will all come back, but it will be used to make agricultural lands out of arid lands. We are willing to submit to Federal control and ownership. We like it out West better than private ownership, but it is a narrow policy that begrudges us the use of a part of the money collected from the lands within our own States. No such policy ought to be suggested here or considered by this House.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close at 2.30 p. m., so that it will give us about an hour and seven minutes from now, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE], the father of the amendment, and the other half by myself for the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto close at half past 2 o'clock, one-half of the time to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from North Carolina. Is there objection?

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I have no objection to closing debate if I can have five minutes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I will yield to the gentleman if a portion of the time is placed at my hands.

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman makes his request with regard to this amendment and all amendments thereto. I sent an amendment to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. FERRIS. I was not trying to cut the gentleman out. I understood the gentleman had an amendment to the section.

Mr. MONDELL. I have an amendment to this particular part of the section. It is necessarily an amendment to this amendment, but if the Chair will not permit me to offer it that way, I want to offer it later.

Mr. FERRIS. I thought the gentleman had an amendment which came to the earlier part of this section, so that it is not an amendment to the amendment, but the gentleman is not precluded at all.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Make it a little less, and have more time on the other.

Mr. FERRIS. It is suggested that we make it 2 o'clock instead of 2.30.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. That would not give enough time.

Mr. FERRIS. Well, 2.15. I ask unanimous consent to modify the request to close the debate at 2.15.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto close at 2.15 p. m., one-half the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Oklahoma and one-half by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to modify that and yield seven minutes to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from California will be recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, as has been said many times by other committees in the House, the Committee on the Public Lands has given this matter full consideration, and it ought not to be amended. Every member of the Committee on the Public Lands, irrespective of his political faith, after going over this matter, believes that it ought to go as is provided in the bill.

There seems to be some difference of opinion as to the disposition of the public lands. In other words, some Members view them as an asset of the Government solely to make money upon, and some men believe—and I do not believe that they have gone into the matter fully, because otherwise they would not take it that way—that they are really doing something for their districts or their States and accomplishing something in Congress if they can reach out to the public-land States and say they have turned over or compelled those communities to turn over their life and existence to the General Government to be generally distributed.

We ought to recognize that practically all of this domain in the West was obtained by acquisition long after the adoption of the Constitution, and it was practically never thought of at that time that we should get such a domain as this. We have added repeatedly new States, and we have defined their territorial boundaries, and we have practically said that they should be developed. We have continued the homestead law and the desert-land law, and it was never intended that there should be a fund made out of the public lands for the sole purpose of accumulating funds for the National Treasury with which to keep up its expenses. There can not be any idea that could be arranged from any viewpoint, if we look at the intention of building up separate and independent sovereign States, that they might have the benefit of the soil of those communities and those States and that their country might be properly built up. Take every Eastern State. With every acre you develop you advance your State; and if you place in private ownership the public lands of the West, so as not to be monopolistic, you are going to advance each State and in turn advance the General Government.

The question now comes up, how best to do it. For the past 40 years we have been giving homesteads, preemptions, timber-culture claims, desert-land claims, and other kinds of claims, to the end that this country in the West might be developed. It has been developing very rapidly; but there has been a changed policy now, and many have said that we are going to reserve great territories for future generations. They have said that we are not going to use it now. We want to close it up from use and reserve it.

It was never the intention to do that originally, I believe, and now the purpose is to relieve these reserves and throw them open in proper shape, so that they may be utilized to the fullest extent—the land, the minerals, and the water power. There is a demand that a law should be passed to make it possible that every acre of land and every particle of mineral and every drop of water shall be utilized, and that there shall be no monopoly while that is being done.

The question now arises, What are you going to do with the value of these water powers and the minerals and the land? Why, every tract of land reserved prevents the State and the county from accumulating and raising taxes to build up the rest of the community. The many roads that have to be built, the schoolhouses, the general improvements, are to be built with funds which come from the exercise of the taxing power of the State and county, from privately owned lands, to the end that that community and that State may be developed. But you reserve half of it, and sometimes two-thirds of it, and thereby reduce the taxing power that much. This bill provides and the purpose of it is that, instead of a sale, there is to be a lease. We want development.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HAY). The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CLINE. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the scheme of distribution of revenue derived from taxation imposed upon the development of water power in this section of the bill. I am opposed to it on broad, economic grounds. Every dollar of revenue derived from rates imposed upon corporations to develop hydroelectricity should go directly to the Federal Treasury. I am unable to understand why the machinery of the Government should be set in motion to collect taxes for local benefits to a single State.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CLINE. I regret I can not. I have only five minutes. In the discussion of this bill and in the one that preceded it, much contention was had over the relative rights of the Federal and State Government under the Constitution. Much of this discussion was restricted and narrowed to the right of the Federal Government in navigable streams and their producing power possibilities, as though the subject of navigation was comprehensive of the whole power of the Federal Government. Navigation is but an incident of its power under the commerce clause of the Constitution, and the question ought to be examined not with reference to the question of the rights of the State and Federal Government in the waters of the State from a navigable or unnavigable standpoint; but in the generation of power that affects the industries of the State and find their way into interstate commerce. Viewed from that standpoint the power the Federal Government over hydroelectro force assumes almost mammoth proportions and the power of a State loses its importance as a factor in dealing with the question. Gentlemen ask where the authority lies for the Federal Government to go into a stream and develop water power where the stream lies within the State. So long as the stream does not become a means of interstate commerce, it probably has no power. But when the rapids in a mountain stream, wholly intrastate, becomes a means to produce trade and commerce in other States, then the management of that power merges into the realm of Federal control, and the States as such lose their significance.

I am not concerned in the location of the streams. Nor am I concerned with the proposition whether it is a navigable or nonnavigable stream. I am concerned only with this proposition: How far will the water in these rapids affect commerce? The United States does not presume to own the waters nor deprive the States of their use for navigation, irrigation, or other purposes. But the Federal Government does say that when you turn the water through the flumes and into the penstocks of great corporations that create power, then the power of the Federal Government intervenes and becomes supreme.

When the water power is developed so that it affects interstate commerce, then it becomes absolutely and unconditionally a matter of Federal jurisdiction, and the right to assess the parties who develop these natural resources is such a right as makes it necessary that the revenues derived therefrom ought to go into the Federal Treasury.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLINE. I am sorry I have not the time. Otherwise I would be glad to yield.

The whole problem rises out of the narrow boundaries of a State into the broad sphere of Federal control. Men discuss this subject as though the Federal Government was subordinate in power to that of a State. The sovereignty of the Federal Government is as ample, complete, and plenary within its constitutional sphere as the individual State is in its. When the State came into the union it surrendered to the Federal Government its sovereignty absolutely over interstate commerce. Gentlemen of the committee say the Federal Government is one of delegated powers, and it is to be inferred from that expression that they mean one of restricted and limited powers. It is admitted that the Federal Government is one of expressed powers, not one of expressly defined and limited powers, but one sufficiently elastic to meet the growing demands of an expanding commerce.

The Federal Government is one of expressed powers in which are resident all those involved powers necessary to make the expressed powers effective for the accomplishment of the purposes for which they were delegated. Gentlemen ask where the power of the Federal Government is designated in the Constitution that authorizes it to invade the limits of the State and take charge of the development of its local water power. Chief Justice Marshall said, in Fourth Wheaton, page 316, speaking of the Constitution:

> Its nature, therefore, requires that only the great outline be marked, its important objects be designated, and the minor ingredients which compose these objects be deduced from the nature of the objects themselves.

Justice Harlan, in One hundred and eighty-eighth United States Reports, page 356, said, in amplifying the statement of Justice Marshall that the objects must be deduced from the ingredients which compose them, in reference to the commerce clause:

> The power which Congress possesses to regulate commerce among the States is plenary, is complete in itself, and is subject to no limitations except such as may be found in the Constitution.

And, further, in Levoy v. United States (177 U. S., 621):

> The power of Congress to regulate the navigable waters of the United States is an incidental power to the expressed power to regulate commerce.

When that question arises the States are precluded from exercising concurrent or independent jurisdiction where the problem of interstate commerce is involved.

Judge Shiras said, in the One hundred and thirty-fifth United States Reports, page 109, that there "were three conditions under which the authority of the Federal Government is supreme":

> First, when the power is lodged exclusively in the Constitution.
> Second, when the power is given to the United States and prohibited to the State.
> Third, when from the very nature and subject of the power it must necessarily be exercised by the National Government exclusively.

The Federal Government will not open its door to the vexatious complications that are bound to arise in a divided empire of its jurisdiction. It would be the means of destroying its own sovereignty if it did, and it will not be shorn of any of those auxiliary agencies that make for the complete manifestation of its power. Much of this discussion has proceeded on the assumption that the power of the Federal Government and the State government were coordinated in the development of power. Viewed from the standpoint of the commerce clause, there is no possibility of such coordination, and when the Federal Government assumed authority under that clause, whether it is a navigable stream or nonnavigable one, a water-power site that turns the wheels of industry that makes for commerce is relieved of all restrictions sought to be imposed by State regulation. It was said in the Kansas-Colorado case that even in a nonnavigable stream had the Federal Government sought to intervene in the interest of navigation it would not have been demurred out of court. That was upon the principle that its jurisdiction to promote and protect navigation extended to the very source of such stream. What does the jurisdiction of the Federal Government mean if it may not actually possess itself of those physical agencies to protect and promote navigation? If that right extends to navigation, a mere subordinate item or element in the vast field of interstate commerce, what can be said of the whole comprehensive subject when its ramifications are as numerous as the industries of the people? Gradually we are discovering the sweeping extent of the doctrine of rational conservation. My friend from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] said that the doctrine declared in the noted Chandler-Dunbar case (220 U. S.) was an announcement when the United States saw fit to take a river or stream possible of improvement for navigable purposes and oust the State as a riparian owner it could do so.

But that was not the doctrine that was declared in that case. That doctrine had been announced for nearly a hundred years, in Gibbons against Ogden, upon which the whole superstructure of Federal authority has since been builded. What the court did say in the Chandler-Dunbar case was that no corporation or man who owned the fast land bordering upon a rapids in an undeveloped stream had any property rights in its potentiality that the Government was bound to pay for when it sought to improve the stream for navigation purposes. That was the new doctrine, and the old feudalistic doctrine of riparian ownership was completely exploded. That decision, which, by the way, was unanimous, speaks the sentiment created by the evolution of national conservation; that the potential power hidden in the rapids of the St. Marys River belonged to the whole people and not to the man who merely chanced to locate upon the fast land which bordered it. It was in response to the evolution of the new doctrine of economics that there is no private, personal interest that ought to be recognized as exclusive in the great natural resources that can subordinate the rights of all the people. It is a rational doctrine that nature's bounties, deposited and created to ameliorate the conditions of all the people, should not become the wealth of one man or set of men to be exploited for their personal, private benefit. Every element of natural wealth which this twentieth-century civilization has made valuable, and which was unquestionably designed to belong to the whole people, ought to be contributing either a tax or a bounty to the Federal Government. Had we known 25 years ago what we know now, would not the great ore belt, containing, in many instances, 98 per cent pure iron; the fields of copper in the Heckley and Calumet region; the anthracite mountains in Pennsylvania; and the lakes of oil and gas hidden under the earth be contributing their portion to the maintenance of the Federal Government? In this war of conflagration involving the whole Caucasian race except ourselves we are casting about for new sources of revenue to meet a depleted Treasury caused by invasion of foreign commerce.

The Morgans, the Carnegies, and the Rogerses gather into their personal possession and to their private ownership the coal and oil and copper and iron that nature has scattered in its limitless abundance for the benefit of all the people. These great sources of revenue have slipped out of our possession as the trustees of the people and left Congress to rebuke itself for its folly. I may pause long enough here to say that the chief merit in the expenditure of $35,000,000 in the development of agricultural Alaska will lie in the proposition that we propose to tax the men who dig the coal in that Territory to pay a revenue to the Federal Government. This bill proposes to engraft upon the country a new system, one that shall set the Federal forces at work to develop commerce; that shall create an officeholding class at the expense of the Federal Government and then turn the profit back into the coffers of the State in which the enterprise is located. Whether there is any constitutional authority for it or not, there can be no question but what it is an inequitable and unjust system. It is not only questioned now, but it always will be doubted whether the Federal power can take money out of the pockets of every citizen to develop in Colorado or Montana any enterprise purely local and turn the proceeds thereof back to its treasury without rendering to the general public any compensation. Gentlemen say that when this fund, in the far-off future sometime, is returned to the reclamation fund, 50 per cent of it shall go back to the Federal Treasury. But the practical results of such a scheme are as visionary as a dream. In the development, protection, and promotion of the Nation's business the expenses are leaping up yearly by the millions. Not only must we have new sources of revenue, but we should apply those material sources of wealth in which a great nationality, with its high purposes, its great civilization, has invested with immense unearned increments of wealth. The Chandler-Dunbar case is a guide now for the future. It recognizes that large and more complete ownership of natural wealth be vested in the people themselves.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. FERGUSSON].

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I doubt the wisdom of legislating too far ahead as to the disposition of taxes. This proposition should not be confused. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] did not so state, but I am afraid the impression is made on the minds of the Members of this House that it is proposed by this bill that from the beginning half the proceeds derived from the leasing of these water powers are to be paid into the treasury of the State in which the plant is located. As a matter of fact, it is provided that for 20 years all the proceeds shall be devoted to the extension, wider and wider, of this reclamation of land that is now reserved from all entry at all, and that is bound to stay so, because be recognize that the principle of conservation has come to stay. Such land is withdrawn from local taxation for all time. This merely proposes that for 20 years the proceeds from the leases by the Government shall be used by the Government for further extension of the same system of reclaiming land now withdrawn by the Government and at present absolutely useless for the settlement of our States in the West. The gentleman from North Carolina is a Member of experience and ability, and he is held in high esteem by all, and I fear that he has created an erroneous impression in the minds of Members. I feel that a member who has as much ability and influence as the gentleman has should consider the justice of leaving this as it is for 20 years. The bill provides that at the end of that time one-half the proceeds shall be paid into the treasuries of the respective States. I suggest to him that that is just and right, because under this policy of conservation all of this immense domain, or a large part of it, is withdrawn forever from local taxation, and for that reason can not help to support the State. There can be no doubt about that. So that it is just that the States 20 years from now may have half the proceeds of these rentals in lieu of the right of taxation they would have had if it were possible to settle up the great arid West as the other parts of the United States were settled up, where everything is subject to State taxation.

In the semiarid West we are to be deprived of that for all time. So that it is the intention of this bill to use these proceeds for 20 years to provide the possibility of getting homes for hungry people from the gentleman's State and from other States. Under this expenditure they can come West and make homes. Good, honest American citizens who are not rich but, on the contrary, many of them very poor, are looking for homes. It can only be done with the help of the Government in properly using this great area now reserved from such entry.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, stating it very briefly, I urge you to consider the fact that we are not asking anything as a gratuity when we ask that, after 20 years have elapsed from the starting of these hydroelectric power projects, half the proceeds shall then begin to be paid to the States in lieu of the loss of taxation which nonarid States have on all the property within their borders. It is only just that we should have something in lieu of the loss of the taxes on property within their respective borders. Under the gentleman's amendment we shall suffer the hardship of having the development of these lands cut off.

I respectfully submit to the House that if we are driven to that necessity, it is no more than just to leave it as it is now, and let future Congresses 20 years from now determine the question of how the proceeds derived from these sources shall be used. There will be statesmen then and there will be new conditions to be met. Why legislate 20 years ahead? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Will the gentleman from Oklahoma use some of his time now?

Mr. FERRIS. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE].

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, in the very limited time given me I can only say that the amendment which has been proposed, to place in the Federal Treasury the proceeds of royalties from water-power projects, would seriously interfere with their development and arouse antagonism to their operations. Something has been said in the debate about the feeling of hostility that has been created in the public-land States against the encroachments of Federal power and that the minds of the people have been prejudiced against the Government by reason of their contact with bureaucratic officials. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the officials of the Government should develop a sympathetic relationship with the people of the Western States. They can do so by assisting in every way all means used to develop our public lands and bring them into a state of production. It seems to me the Government should manifest a friendly disposition toward our people, and this can be demonstrated by its willingness to turn back into the treasuries of the respective States the proceeds which it derives from their efforts, and thus encourage them to further industry and further development.

The success of the leasing policy proposed in this and other bills now before the House in a large measure depends upon the hearty cooperation of the people living in the respective States and the Federal Government. If the people believe that the natural resources of their States are to be exploited by the Government and the fruits of such exploitation are to be shared by States whose resources are absolutely divorced from Federal control and regulation, there will naturally arise a feeling of enmity toward the Government and against other sections of the country, which would be generally deplored. The Government is merely providing an undeveloped power site by the provisions of this bill. The other elements of value are to be supplied by the State by the use of its water and by the people in creating a market for the power. Why should the Government assume the right to take all the proceeds from royalties and allow no portion to other sources of value such as I have mentioned? There should be the heartiest association of interest and effort in this legislation if it is to become a fixed policy. This can only be brought about by assuring the people who are to be directly affected of the intention of the Government to assist them in every way to develop and conserve their local resources and not to exploit them for the benefit of other sections and States. No better assurance can be given of this purpose by the Government than to put into law the provision of this bill which sets aside the proceeds from rentals and royalties to be used as a part of the great reclamation fund, which has become one of the most productive agencies of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me this matter is a simple one, provided we keep in mind always the distinction between that which belongs to the States and that which belongs to the Federal Government. Unquestionably, all the moneys coming from the proceeds of the sale of public lands ought to go into the Public Treasury. That proposition will not be denied. Another proposition equally true is that where the improvement has been made by money paid out of the Federal Treasury for the development of water power, which is an incident to the development of navigation, all of the proceeds of the money paid for the power thus developed, being derived from the investment of Federal money, is Federal revenue and should go into the Federal Treasury. It is our duty to see that the Federal Government gets that which belongs to the Federal Government and that it be not deflected from the Federal Treasury into another source.

As to what the Federal Government may do with money paid into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts is a question for Congress, and should at all times be under the immediate control of Congress; and if Congress sees fit to spend the money for the further development of these projects in the great West, then Congress can easily do it. By putting it into the Federal Treasury at this time under this amendment would leave it absolutely within the control of Congress to dispose of the revenue as it sees fit and proper. Under this bill as written you fix a policy for 20 years, irrespective of how it may operate 5 or 6 or 7 or 8 years from now. You will have incurred obligations under the bill which it might not be proper for Congress to change, although it might be best for the country that the change should be made. Now, in order that it may not be complicated in some manner which we can not foresee it is infinitely better to adopt this amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina and have the money put into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts. We thereby keep a check on what is going on.

I believe the conservation of the public domain ought to have begun many years ago. I think the West to-day is suffering more from the great land monopoly, more from the great land grants under a policy adopted when they believed that land would always be plentiful, than from any other source. The speculation in land and the ruthless manner in which the public domain has been taken up by a few men is to-day shackling the development of that country.

It will not be contended here successfully nor will Congress ever adopt the policy that these lands and property of the West may not, at the proper time, be taken up by honest, bona fide citizens who expect to make a livelihood off their land. And these men who have speculated and extorted millions from the men who came from the East—these men, under the policy being enforced now, will be compelled to show some bona fide citizenship, some good intention, before they can get a part of the public domain. For this reason, Mr. Chairman, I believe that this amendment should be adopted, because Congress is in a position to better control the funds than if we adopt the bill as written. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope the Members from the East and the South will not delude themselves with dreams as to the possibility of great revenue flowing into the United States Treasury as the result of any amendment which is proposed. I hope, also, that the western Members who have come finally to believe that this bill, without the Page amendment, will bring great sums to the reclamation funds may not be disappointed. But for this clause I believe they would all be against this bill. It will create more bureaus, more overhead charges, and more governmental agents and employees. Some ardent supporters of this bill seem to think that, once it is passed, all the Government will have to do will be to sign some leases and that thousands upon thousands of unused electrical energy will begin to turn wheels and make things hum out West. If in the State of Washington a 10 per cent revenue from the sale of timber permits the Government to build roads in the reserves of that State at the rate of 1 mile for every 1,000,000 acres, you may rest assured that the profits that will be developed for the United States from water power on the public domain in 11 Western States will not be enough to pay for the paper upon which the books are kept. [Laughter and applause.] The amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE], if adopted, would simply make a bad proposition worse.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] will not prevail. The bill as it came from the committee and as it now stands provides that the rentals derived from leases of the public domain on which is generated hydroelectric power shall be paid to the reclamation fund for a period of 20 years, there to be used in the reclamation of lands in the great arid West. At the expiration of the said 20 years this bill provides that one-half of the proceeds derived from such leases shall be paid to the various States in which the power is generated, to be used for school funds or other State improvements, as directed by the several legislatures thereof. The amendment under consideration provides that the revenue derived from the lease of these lands shall be paid direct to the Federal Treasury.

Personally I think it makes but little difference where these revenues go, because, in my judgment, the amount will be very small. But I do believe that revenue derived from power generated exclusively in a State should be used for the benefit of that State.

There are in this House and in this country two distinct schools of thought on this question, one of them maintaining that every power site should go into private ownership, so that private capital may develop it; the other is that no power site should be owned by a private individual, but should be retained by the Federal Government and leased to the individual for a term of years. In my opinion, many who maintain this latter view have attempted to make the term of years so short in this bill as to practically nullify its operation.

There is no doubt that the people of this country believe in conservation, but they do not believe in a system of conservation which means tying up the resources of all that great western country. They believe in conservation that will allow the natural resources to be developed, so that homes may be built for a land-hungry people and that we may produce our quota of the food supply of the world.

This is not a partisan question. The principle incorporated in this bill is advocated by ex-Secretary of the Interior Fisher and ex-Secretary of the Interior Garfield—one a Republican, the other a Progressive—and by the present Secretary Lane, a Democrat. I regret to note that nearly everyone who has advocated this amendment has adverted to the fact that a few days ago this House passed a bill extending the payments on reclamation projects for a period of 10 years, and have commented rather caustically that this extension was made without demanding from the settlers interest on such deferred payments. And that is used as an argument to prove that the money now derived from power plants should be turned into the Federal Treasury. I recall very distinctly with what tenacity the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and his colleague [Mr. MADDEN] clung to and fought for that policy. They argued that the moneys derived from the public lands belonged to the Federal Treasury; and that if the same was to be used by a portion of the people for the improvement of their lands, they should pay interest on the same. I believed then and I believe now these gentlemen were mistaken. A considerable portion of the money appropriated in the rivers and harbors bill is used for the protection of lands along the rivers of the country. Nobody has suggested that because these people derived a benefit from these moneys that they should pay interest on the same.

The suggestion has repeatedly been made upon this floor during this discussion that the great arid West is asking too much from this Congress. It is true that about $80,000,000 have been appropriated to date for the reclamation of arid lands. But let us compare that for a moment with the amount appropriated for rivers and harbors. The bill as passed this House last February for the latter purpose carried more than $45,000,000, and as reported to the Senate now carries $55,000,000. Though I have not the figures before me, I venture the statement that in the last 40 years ten times as much money has been appropriated for rivers and harbors as has been appropriated for the reclamation of the arid lands of the West.

We of the West are not looking for charity. We think the Federal Government has the right to do as it pleases with its own, so far as the public domain is concerned We do not believe, however, that this Congress should be so shortsighted as to cripple those States by taking from them the revenues of any of their resources, as provided for in this bill, to be used somewhere else by the Government. I think you men from the East and South do not realize that a large percentage of our lands are now withdrawn from public entry or disposal of any kind. These lands are not permitted to bear their share of the taxes of the several States in which they are located. Coal lands, phosphate lands, oil lands, timberlands, water-power sites—all withdrawn. It is therefore no wonder that the people of the West have from time to time resented the methods pursued in the administration of the remaining public lands.

This bill and all the other conservation bills now before Congress should be promptly passed that these great States may go on with reasonable development. Surely no one can doubt the patriotism of the present Secretary of the Interior. He is an ardent advocate of this bill in its present form; he is a tireless worker for the development of the western country. He knows that in its development he is working not alone for that section of the country, but for all the country. The West has great resources and far-reaching possibilities, but it is as yet undeveloped, and must remain undeveloped so long as its natural resources are withdrawn and no legislation enacted to permit the development thereof.

There is no more interesting question now confronting the American people, no question that demands the best thought of the most profound statesmen of the country, than the question of increasing the food supply of the Nation, and thereby beating down the price of the necessities of life. To adopt this amendment would of necessity tend to retard the development of arid lands that require irrigation. A very large proportion of the lands of the country susceptible of cultivation without irrigation is now being utilized. The increase in new food-producing lands must largely come from irrigated lands situated in the 11 Western States; and we who know that country believe that you gentlemen who are pursuing a course which would tend to retard that work are adopting a short-sighted policy.

No conflict should arise between the Federal and State Governments on this question, but only the heartiest cooperation and concord. Likewise, there should be no sectionalism. The western men have voted for your appropriations for rivers and harbors, and yet they do not use a dollar of the money. They believe it is a great national problem that is to be met, and we think that you in turn should give us your support ungrudgingly for a fair and equitable treatment of the great, bounding West.

Let me cite just one instance in an effort to vindicate my views for the urgent necessity for the passage of this bill. Fifty miles from where I live lies the great Flathead Lake, the largest body of fresh water west of the Great Lakes. At the foot of this lake are many falls. Engineers have estimated that when the power is developed along these falls it will produce anywhere from 100,000 to 200,000 horsepower. It is said to be the finest undeveloped water-power site in America. And it lies idle and the water continues to run to the sea unused. The Government of the United States expended $80,000 initiating the development of power here. They then ascertained that they had no law under which to proceed with the development. They likewise found they had no authority to allow private individuals to proceed. And thus the matter stands. Only a distance of 2 or 3 miles separates these falls from the beautiful, progressive town of Polson, with a score of other thriving towns in a radius of 40 or 50 miles, with two transcontinental railroads which, no doubt, would use current for transporting their trains through the mountains. The power is there, and all it needs is the opportunity to develop it. It is therefore imperative that this or some similar bill be passed, not, of course, for this particular project, but for many projects lying undeveloped on the public domain of the great Rocky Mountain States. And we earnestly insist that when the bill is passed it be passed in such form as to do justice to the States whose resources are to such a large extent now withdrawn from development, devoid of the opportunity to bear their just share of taxation.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, how much time is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina has consumed 11 minutes and the gentleman from Oklahoma 15 minutes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the Page amendment. The measure proposed by this committee is the inauguration, in my judgment, of a very dangerous policy. If the policy proposed in this measure be inaugurated, it will not stop at water-power projects in devoting one-half of the proceeds to the use of the State. The next will be the coal, and next will be the oil, and nobody can approximate the amount that will be derived from these sources. Then will come timber, and so on down the line. Now, if we inaugurate the policy in this proposition, it will come back to confront and vex us in other propositions. New York, after a while, will claim one-half of the revenues collected at her port. Then Pennsylvania will claim her part. Then Massachusetts will want her part; and when you have once entered on a policy of that kind, these States have just as much right to make these claims as the States in the water-power belt. The result of it will be that other States will be claiming the same benefit from legislation for revenues collected from things within their States as these States are now seeking in this measure; and who is there that would attempt to predict where it will end and what the ultimate result will be? It may cause strife between States, and break up existing harmony.

This policy, if once inaugurated and started throughout the Union, will work injury instead of benefit to the States of the West, as well as the States in the central portion of the Union. This money should be paid into the Treasury, as is proposed by the Page amendment. Congress has always been liberal in dealing with Western States in the different improvements they have desired, and it will continue that liberality, but when these States come to Congress and claim that one-half of all the moneys derived from the water powers should be paid for reclamation purposes, for schools, or any other purpose, in their States, they are attempting to foist on the Government a policy that will be injurious to them in the end. Consequently I hope that the Page amendment will be adopted. If one-half of the coal in the public lands, if one-half of the oil or the timber is paid into the reclamation fund or other fund for the use of the State from which the fund is derived, the same privilege and same benefits will be claimed by other States from the public revenue derived from sources within their borders.

So the proposition as contained in this bill is a policy which, if inaugurated, will become a dangerous policy instead of a beneficial one. I hope the Page amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

It is the duty of Congress to assist in the promotion of worthy objects of public advantage in the Western States, and it has, as every man well knows, responded to their requirements liberally. I am glad it has, because great possibilities are in the West, and the development of that great territory will solve some of the questions which now are requiring the best thought of the ablest minds in our country. In the near future vast arid regions now barren in that section will be producing grain in larger quantities than in any other part of the country. In making the plains productive the entire country is interested and ready to lend assistance, but adopting the policy proposed in this bill may arouse sectionalism, and if it should injury would result and this proposed development might be retarded. Better proceed as heretofore. This is the property of all the people, not of the people of the States alone in which they are located, and whatever is derived therefrom should be paid into the Public Treasury for the use of the entire country. [Applause.]

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I yield the remainder of the time on this side to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will prevail. This bill provides that the rentals obtained from leases of the public domain for the generation of hydroelectric power shall be paid into the reclamation fund and thereafter one-half of the proceeds shall be paid over to the various States in which the power is generated for the school funds. Under the act creating the Reclamation Service the proceeds of the sales of public lands in the arid and semiarid States were dedicated to the reclamation fund. The provision in this bill, however, goes much further. It not only turns over half of the proceeds from the rentals after they have been used in the reclamation fund to the States for public-school systems in the arid and semiarid States, but it appropriates this money for the public-school systems of any public-land State, provided the power is generated in that State. All of the public-land States when admitted into the Union were granted sections 16 and 32 in every township to provide a public-school fund. The State of Oklahoma practically had no public lands and so in the organic act an appropriation of $5,000,000 was made to provide a school fund. The State of Texas when it was admitted into the Union kept all of its public lands itself. The Federal Government did not get the public lands in Texas, and yet that State would not be precluded under this provision from receiving the benefits of these rentals. The Congress at this session is providing for the development of water power or hydroelectric power by the utilization of water under two acts. One is this bill, by which hydroelectric power is to be developed by leases upon the public land, and it is proposed that the proceeds from such leases shall be disposed of in such a manner that one-half of them shall be permanently for the specific benefit of the public-land States.

In the other act, the general dam act, an entirely different policy is proposed. The House voted into that act a provision that where authority is given by the Federal Government for the erection of a dam on a navigable river so as to provide for the development of hydroelectric power the Federal Government shall charge for the permit given, and all of the proceeds obtained in that way shall go into the Federal Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. Take, for instance, what may happen in the State of New York. Suppose it was proposed to erect a dam on the Hudson River for the purpose of developing power so as to generate hydroelectric power. The Federal Government has certain control or rights in the Hudson River, because it is a navigable stream. The water in that river belongs to the State of New York. The only control the Federal Government has over it is to so regulate its use that the interests of navigation shall not be affected, and yet under the bill which passed the House if application be made to the Federal Government for authority to construct a dam, the purpose of which is to utilize the water to develop hydroelectric power, although the only right the Federal Government has is to see to it that the works erected will not in any way interfere with navigation, the Congress has provided that the consent of the Federal Government shall not be given unless there be fixed a charge, which is to be paid by those making application, and paid to the Federal Government, and that money turned into the Federal Treasury. Under this bill, however, if we grant a lease of any part of the public domain for the purpose of developing power, the proceeds are to be turned into the reclamation fund, and after having been used one-half is permanently appropriated for the support of the public-school system in that State.

This entire policy of making permanent appropriations of public funds is absolutely indefensible. All of the trouble, all of the wickedness that has developed in connection with the Reclamation Service, in my opinion, has come from the fact that Congress turned over the entire proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the arid and semiarid States to administrative officials, to be expended without any direct control or supervision by Congress. Seventy million dollars have already been expended and twenty million more are authorized to be advanced from the Treasury on certificates of indebtedness. We have passed legislation to extend for 10 years, without interest, the time within which payments should be made by settlers, but more vicious than all, more far-reaching in its effects than anything else, is the fact that the cost of putting water on the lands, which must eventually be paid by the settlers, has been increased probably from $20 to $40 per acre more than it would have been if the appropriations for reclamation projects had been kept under the control and supervision of Congress. The estimate of the Army and other engineers is that it will take from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 to complete the reclamation projects already authorized and in the course of construction. More than $70,000,000 have already been expended, and all there is in sight to meet this expenditure is $8,000,000 or $9,000,000 annually that will go into the reclamation fund. The result is that in order to complete these projects Congress will be compelled—there is no escape from it—to appropriate from the General Treasury annually additional moneys to those now obtained in the reclamation fund. They must be completed. That is inevitable. Anyone who has examined into the Reclamation Service and what it has been doing knows that it is absolutely necessary to call upon the General Treasury to supplement the proceeds of the reclamation fund. I regret my time is limited. I wish I could point out some unanswerable arguments against the policy proposed. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE] has covered some of the ground. This amendment should prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, my State has never had one dollar of irrigation money spent within its borders, so I can speak entirely dispassionately upon this amendment. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, would, if he could have his way, have every penny of Government expenditures brought in under his thumb and through his committee. That is natural. It is natural that he should want it, and it is natural that he should try to acquire it and exact it. But there are other committees and other localities and other parts of the House that are entitled to a little consideration, and against the efforts of the gentleman to break down irrigation in this country, a thing that I do not think this Congress should do. I feel sure the House will go against his wishes to make this bill one of filching from the Western States—a burden, an onerous condition, almost more, I fear, than they can stand in their present sparsely settled condition. As against the views of the gentleman just expressed I will call to my aid a few authorities on the subject. Secretary Lane appeared before the Committee on the Public Lands when the hearings were had, and he was consulted on this proposition. Among other things, he said:

The money returned to the Federal Government is a matter of minor importance, so long as the maximum development of a given site at the lowest possible rates to consumers and the prevention of monopoly is obtained.

Does anyone doubt the patriotism of Secretary Lane? Does anyone doubt his efforts in the public interest? He has been a tireless worker for the western development, and in so doing he is working in the interest of all of us. This talk about doing too much for the West is not well said; in fact, it is poorly said. The West has great possibilities, but they are yet poor and are not able to support the whole Union. Now, just stop and think for a moment. There are two well-defined views in this House. One is that every power site ought to go into private ownership at once and let capital develop it, and let there go with it the onerous, hard, oppressive conditions that go with the development of power in the West, where it is already too greatly monopolized. The other view is to retain Federal control, to lease the water power for a term of years at reasonable rates, subject to careful regulation, as provided for in this bill. Now, that brings us to the third question, of what shall we do with the money, and that is this amendment. We passed the river and harbor bill, which as it passed the House carried $45,000,000, and as reported from the Senate it carries $55,000,000, to improve the rivers and harbors of the East, and the western Members all voted with you, and it passed practically by unanimous consent.

That is not all. That expenditure will never come back to the Federal Treasury. It was an outright appropriation, not a loan, as the irrigation fund is. All this bill asks to do is to let the West develop itself. All this bill asks to do is to let the water-power receipts for the present go on and irrigate the West. There is no more burning question in this country to-day than the increased production of food products and thereby beating down the price of food, and if gentlemen take it upon themselves to break down irrigation and break down the development of the West, they do a thing that will be heavy and hard for their party and the country. They ought not to do it. [Applause.] If it was right to pass the reclamation law in 1902, giving the proceeds from the sale of public lands to the West where we part with the fee, surely it is only an act of justice to give the proceeds from a lease and retain the fee in the Federal Government for the development of the West. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], who is a clear-headed man, says that we do not give it to the West, but merely loan it as a mortgage, and every cent of it will be returned. He is right about it. It costs the Treasury nothing and is to be repaid.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I have only a few moments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Every cent goes ultimately into the school system.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me, for I have only saved a very short time for the committee. Let me go a little further. Let us see what ex-Secretary of the Interior Fisher says about it. He was before our committee. His head is usually as clear as any of ours here. He has given great attention to this subject and is in favor of conservation. He does not want to make this bill unpopular; does not want to break down our irrigation in the West. Let us see what he says about it. On page 21 of the hearings Mr. Fisher says:

Now, my own notion of it is it ought to start with very nominal charges; that the charge ought to be small at the start, and it ought to be purposely small, so as to encourage development and to give time to build the plant and get into operation. The charge can be put on a nominal basis and then periodically, say periods of 10 years, that matter ought to be readjusted.

I call attention to the fact that the leasing contract would provide for a readjustment of these provisions as often as the leasing contract desires to have it done in the public interest. He has the right view. There can be little doubt about it. I call attention to the fact that after the development proceeds for, say, 10, 20, or 30 years, then Congress in its wisdom may step in and say this fund shall not longer be used in the West and the development of the West, but shall go into the Federal Treasury. I call attention to the fact that only 6,000,000 horsepower of a possible 200,000,000 horsepower is now in use.

Why on earth does anybody want to make this law unpopular? Why should they want to break down these conservation bills? Why should they want to break down the irrigation law? Why should they want to undo all the good that this bill does, when the present Secretary, the ex-Secretary, the head of the Geological Survey, and every man who has given clear-headed attention to this question does not agree with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, does not agree with the amendment or anything like it offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE], and does not agree with this constant assault upon irrigation and the development of the West? I repeat, if it was wise to pass a reclamation law giving the proceeds of the sale of the fee to the West, it is wise to let them use this lease money temporarily in the West. If it was wise to legislate $35,000,000 for the development of Alaska, surely it is wise to let the West develop itself without one penny coming out of the Federal Treasury. It is the undoubted right of the gentleman from New York, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—he is right about it—to guard well the Federal Treasury. It is right to look with careful scrutiny at every proposition to take money from the Federal Treasury, but I fear he goes a little outside of his jurisdiction when he seeks to regulate and take full control of the development of the West. I feel sure he reaches out a little further than he should in reference to this matter concerning the West, a matter with which he can not from the nature of things be very familiar. This bill carries not one cent of appropriation. This bill asks not one cent from the Treasury. It merely asks for the present to let the West develop the West from its own resources. It is too much, Mr. Chairman, in the Western States that have but a handful of men to try to succeed on a sagebrush, mesquite-grass flat where it seldom rains. Oh, it is easy for the advocates of this amendment to say we will reach out and get money from those Western States and enrich the Federal Treasury. I call attention to the somber fact that the entire reclamation act, including the $20,000,000 loan, which must be repaid, is only $79,000,000; only $79,000,000 has been raised in 12 years, and every cent will come back to the Treasury. In the river and harbor bill we appropriated $55,000,000 in a single year, which practically passed the House by unanimous consent, and I voted for it, and my colleagues from the West about me voted for it; we all voted for it, and yet men say it is too much to say that the West shall not develop itself. Let us take pride in the West. Let us develop the West. Let us work together about it. It is a task worthy of our time. It will be a monument that will endure for all of us. Let us do so now. Let us work at it together. Let us accomplish it together. Let us do it not for the West, but for the country. [Applause.]

I ask for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I ask for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 68.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 1, after the word "rentals," insert the following:
"As follows: First, 5 per cent per annum of the value of the lands leased.
"Second, such sum per annum as shall measure the benefits to the lessee of all expenditures by the United States on the drainage area of the stream from which the lessee obtains water for power, which payments shall in no case exceed in the aggregate the total sum expended by the United States for the protection of the watershed and not more than 5 per cent per annum of the cost of works erected by the United States which may be beneficial to lessees."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE], a few moments ago in the discussion, properly characterized the charges provided for in this section. He said they were a tax. He did not say to us on what authority the Federal Government levies a tax on an enterprise within a State, a tax not uniform throughout the States. The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall lease certain lands belonging to the Government, and then it proceeds to provide that by reason of that lease of lands the Secretary of the Interior may make a charge for horsepower on all the power developed by the enterprise. In other words, the Secretary could make as great a charge or a greater charge for the use of an acre as was made for the use of 100,000 acres. An enterprise using 1,000 acres of public land might be charged but 10 per cent of the amount charged another enterprise using one-tenth or less than one-tenth of the amount of land.

As the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] says, this is an excise tax. The Constitution of the United States says that excise taxes shall be uniform throughout the Union. It is not intended that these shall be uniform. They can not be uniform, because they only apply to certain States. It is not intended that they shall be uniform within the States affected. They could not be under the provisions of this bill. It is not intended that they shall be uniform with regard to the projects developed under this act. The Secretary may make them high in one case and low in another. Gentlemen pass over this as though it were a very ordinary piece of legislation, as though it was a very common thing in Congress to introduce and pass bills under which we levy excise taxes on certain industries of certain States of the Union. It is entirely proper, if we are to lease the lands of the Government for this or any other purpose, that we should obtain proper revenue from the lease. It is also proper, if an enterprise is situated on public lands and there are expenditures on other public lands that benefit the enterprise, that the enterprise should pay for the benefits. Some of these projects, some of these water powers, will be on forest reserves, and a large portion of the drainage area above the water power will be controlled by the Federal Government, and it is hoped that the protection of the reserve will increase the flow of water. It is possible that the Government may erect dams and build reservoirs on forest reserves that may benefit water powers lower down. It is entirely proper that the power so benefited shall pay for the benefit. And that is what my amendment does. It provides, first, that the National Government shall demand of the lessee a sum not to exceed 5 per cent per annum of the reasonable value of the land used by him; second, that he shall pay the cost of whatever expenditure is made by the Federal Government on his watershed so far as it shall benefit him; that he, and others situated as he is, lessees of the Government, shall pay 5 per cent per annum of the actual capital cost of any improvements made by the Federal Government which may benefit the enterprise. That is all that the Federal Government as a proprietor can properly charge. It is all that the Federal Government should attempt to charge. To do any more than that is to attempt to do an unconstitutional thing. It is an attempt to lay heavy burdens on certain selected enterprises in certain States that are not laid on other like enterprises in the same States and are not laid on any enterprise in other States. The effect of it will be to take from the States large sources of revenue. The effect of it will be, if any considerable burden shall be laid upon these enterprises, to give an advantage to the powers already developed and to make it difficult to develop under this act.

The House passed a few days ago what is known as the Adamson bill, or dam act, relating to the development of water power on navigable streams. A number of rather curious and questionable provisions were inserted in that bill, but the House refused to place in it any provision for a tax on the power development. It was realized that such a tax would have been unconstitutional as well as inequitable and a burden which ultimately must fall on the consumer; but there would have been at least some excuse for a provision of that kind where the Government controls the water utilized. What a howl such a provision, applied to the East and South, would have brought forth! Yet it is coolly proposed to levy such an excise tax on development in the public-land States, where the only interest or control the Government has arises out of the ownership of some lands that may be utilized, possibly only for a transmission line, and where the people of the State themselves own the one essential element, to wit, the water. These enterprises should pay for any rights and benefits they receive from the Federal Government in the use of its lands, for any increase or protection a forest reserve, or expenditures on it, may produce in stream flow; but beyond that the Federal Government has neither a legal nor equitable right to lay heavy burdens on industries which the consumers must pay, and which may be so heavy as to deprive communities of the opportunity of collecting revenues or compelling them to collect them on top of charges already too heavy.

Under this bill one man, the Secretary of the Interior, whoever he may be, is given full control over the taxing power. We assume the right to levy an excise tax lacking in the constitutional requirement of uniformity, and then we assume authority to delegate this unconstitutional power to the Secretary of the Interior to fix as he sees fit. He may make the rate prohibitive or he may make it high in one case and low in another. Never was such unlimited power to lay burdens or to grant favors extended to anyone under a republican form of government. The States and their people, you would imagine, had no rights which Congress is bound to respect and which may not be handed over to a Federal official. Of course I do not anticipate that these provisions will ever become a law. They are being railroaded through the committee here, without anyone making a serious argument in their defense. About the only answer one receives to arguments against them is that those who do not like them and complain of them do not love their country. Fortunately these questions will be really considered in another body where there is opportunity for debate and some consideration for the rights of the people in their various States and communities.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the fact that the present value of the land might not be worth more than one dollar and a quarter an acre and the dam site might in the future be worth $1,000,000. So there must be few here who would want to put a positive prohibition in the law that the Secretary could not go beyond 5 per cent of the present value. This amendment may have good in it, but I fail to observe it. It certainly is not what the House would desire to do. It certainly is not what they should do. It could not be in the interest of the Government. It is sure to hinder and work against our interests. It ought to be disagreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Page 7, line 3, after the word "and," insert "50 per cent of"; and on page 7, line 7, after the word "act," strike out the remainder of the line and all of lines 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 down to and including the word "found" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and 50 per cent of the proceeds."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, we voted a few moments ago on an amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE], the purpose of which was to strike out the provision of the bill which places in the reclamation fund the sums received from leases under this act. I voted against the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, and I am very glad that it was defeated by so large a majority. And yet the provision which we thus retained in the bill is not a fair, a just, or an equitable one. If the provision now in the bill shall remain and it becomes a law as it is, with regard to the basis and nature of the charges, we shall have levied under the Constitution, prohibiting it, an excise tax on and limited to certain enterprises in certain States, and we shall have taken from the States to the extent that we have so levied the power of the State to collect revenue.

Now, we propose to take those receipts and place them in the reclamation fund, and we think that we are doing a very generous thing when we do that. I can not see it. If there is any considerable development under this bill, it will result in vast enterprises that, in some localities at least, would constitute the main source of revenue for schools and for roads and other local purposes, and yet we do not propose to give to the States or the communities any part of all these vast sums so collected. We might raise under this bill $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 or $5,000,000 a year in the State of California, for instance, and all of it might be used for the purpose of building irrigation works in Texas. We might have under it great enterprises in Wyoming, and all the receipts from those enterprises might be used for building irrigation works in Montana, California, or Idaho. We are taking from the people locally the power of taxation, taking it over and proposing to return to them nothing. No part of the moneys which we thus take from them—moneys that otherwise would be obtained by the communities and by the States through the ordinary channels of taxation—is to be paid them.

My proposition is to divide the receipts, to provide that 50 per cent of them shall be paid to the States, to be used for the maintenance of the schools and roads, and that the other 50 per cent shall go into the reclamation fund instead of placing it all in the reclamation fund, as the bill now provides.

It is true that there is a provision in the bill that at the end of 20 years or 25 years the half which goes into the reclamation fund in the first instance shall return to the State, but the States will have starved for revenues before that time shall have arrived. And, furthermore, I can not understand, and I have not found anyone else who could understand, how you could tag a dollar going into the reclamation fund, along with millions of other dollars, and determine where it went and when it was paid back. I do not believe the provision for turning half of it back to the States after it has been paid into the reclamation fund and paid back is workable.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the committee hopes that no one will support that amendment. It is not digested. It has not been looked up. It has not been considered, and it changes the whole policy of the bill. I hope the committee will not adopt it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill favorably with amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House, with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FITZGERALD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 16673) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, had directed him to report back the bill with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. Will it be in order now to have the amendments read that were adopted in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. It is not usual; but, still——

Mr. WINGO. I will ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that they be read for information.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendments.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Does it not take unanimous consent to have these amendments reported?

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I will withdraw my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas withdraws his request. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered, is it not?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn. It is apparent that we can not get a quorum here to-day.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

PHILIPPINE LEGISLATION (S. DOC. NO. 565).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

As required by section 86 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," I transmit herewith a set of the laws enacted by the Third Philippine Legislature during its second session, from October 16, 1913, to February 3, 1914, inclusive, and its special session, from February 6 to 28, 1914, inclusive, together with certain laws enacted by the Philippine Commission.

None of these acts or resolutions have been printed.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 22, 1914.

The SPEAKER. There is a large bundle of accompanying documents. The message will be printed, but the accompanying documents will not be printed for the present, unless the House orders the printing. The message and accompanying documents will be referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

PHILIPPINE PUBLIC LAND ACT (H. DOC. NO. 1148).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President, which was read and, with the accompanying letter, referred to the Committee on Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit herewith act No. 2325 of the Third Philippine Legislature, entitled:

An act amending section 13 of act No. 926, known as "the public-land act," by specifying the manner in which the publication of the notices of sale of lands shall be made.

I have approved the act and submit it in accordance with the provisions of section 13 of the act of Congress approved July 1, 1902, entitled:

Whereas the Union Pacific Railroad Co. is said to have issued an order closing the Salt Lake and Ogden gateways after October 1 to all passenger traffic from eastern and southern points originating on the Denver & Rio Grande Railway, or other Gould railroads, so called, the effect whereof will be to inflict a very large and unjust loss upon said railroads, for which there is no justification; and

Whereas the enforcement of said order will deprive the States of Colorado and Utah of a very large percentage of tourist business and divert an enormous passenger traffic from said States, to their great injury; and

Whereas said order is said to have been made to deter and intimidate capital from the reorganization and equipment of the Western Pacific Railroad, a competitor of the Union Pacific Road for the traffic of the Pacific coast, and thereby accomplish its undoing: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the United States, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to inquire into and investigate the reasons for making said order; the necessity, if any, for shutting the passenger traffic of the Denver & Rio Grande and other southern and southeastern railroads out of the gateways of Salt Lake and Ogden and the Union Pacific lines leading therefrom; the effect of the enforcement of said order upon tourist and other passenger traffic to and through Colorado and Utah; the effect thereof upon the Western Pacific Railroad; and report the result of its investigation to the Senate as early as may be consistent with the making thereof.

So Mr. LANE's amendment was adopted.

Mr. GRONNA. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section, to be numbered section 17, and to read as follows:

SEC. 17. That all the provisions of this act are hereby extended to include elevators and warehouses for the storage of grain and flaxseed, together with inspection, classification, and issuance of receipts and certificates, to the same extent, so far as applicable, as the same are specifically made applicable to warehouses for the storage and classification of cotton, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill, that there has been no estimate for the expenses, that the amendment has not been before any committee; that there has been no estimate by any department or by any committee, and that it involves the expenditure of money.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order as made by the Senator from Missouri is only applicable to amendments made to general appropriation bills and to no other bills. The point of order is overruled.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, this amendment adds nothing new to the bill. It simply places all kinds of grain and flaxseed on an equality with cotton. It calls for no appropriation whatever.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to discuss it further just now. I hope, however, that we can have a vote on it and that the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, there is a meeting to-day down at the Pan American Building of various representatives from the cotton States. It is a matter of very great importance to my constituents and to the entire country, and I ask the consent of the Senate to absent myself during the day to attend that meeting. At the same time I announce my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make the further point of order that the subject matter contained in this proposed amendment has been twice before the Senate at this session and has been twice defeated, and that it is in fact bringing up matter that has been twice voted upon finally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has a recollection that the bill of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], which the Chair assumes is the bill referred to by the Senator from Missouri, was a bill which provided for a uniform system of grain inspection throughout the United States of America. The amendment is not identical in terms and it does not appear to the Chair to be identical in substance with the bill of the Senator from North Dakota. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. REED. I was going to ask the Chair to hear me on the question of identity, but, of course, if my point of order is ruled upon I do not want to argue it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair paid a great deal of attention to that discussion and the Chair thinks that the bill of the Senator from North Dakota was practically a measure dispensing with State grain inspection. This amendment is not of that character.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I think it was last Thursday when this bill was before the Senate I suggested the following amendment to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], who stated that it was satisfactory to him, and I especially called my colleague's attention to it. The amendment which I then suggested read as follows:

That all the provisions of this act shall apply as far as practicable to warehouses for and inspection of wheat, oats, barley, corn, flaxseed, and rye, and the further sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be required, is hereby appropriated to pay salaries and expenses relative to grain warehouses for and inspecting of said grain.

I was not here Saturday. I want to ask my colleague if the amendment which he now offers differs in any respect other than the appropriation from that which I suggested, and if so, will he kindly explain to me wherein is the difference?

Mr. GRONNA. I do not think my amendment differs from the amendment of my colleague except in the language appropriating $50,000. Of course, that would make it subject to the point of order made by the Senator from Missouri. I have no pride of opinion about the amendment, and if the Senator prefers it to mine I shall be very glad to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MCCUMBER. No; my colleague and myself are working toward one general end.

Mr. GRONNA. That is true.

Mr. MCCUMBER. All I am desirous of knowing is whether the amendment of my colleague is substantially the same as mine with the exception that no appropriation is made in his amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. It is substantially the same. It is practically the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire of the senior Senator from North Dakota, if, by the statement that he and his colleague are working toward the same general end, he means to imply that the amendment is in effect the same as the bill that was introduced by him and defeated?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I wish it was, Mr. President; but it is not. It is simply one little brick in the superstructure of a foundation on which my colleague and myself hope at some time to build the general structure of Federal inspection. It does not give us the Federal inspection that we ask for and which we have been fighting for, but it is along that general idea of Federal supervision and the issuance of a certificate that will give some confidence to purchasers.

But, Mr. President, I am a little fearful that the amendment as suggested by my colleague with nothing further would be a sort of a dead letter. I call my colleague's attention to section 15:

SEC. 15. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, available until expended, for the expenses of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, including the payment of such rent and the employment of such persons and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere.

I presume with this amendment which has been suggested the entire $50,000, if any work was done in the agricultural line in reference to the inspection of grain, and so forth, would be somewhat divided, and it certainly would be a very meager sum. I was going to suggest that my colleague ought to add to his amendment—and the further sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be required, is hereby appropriated to pay salaries and expenses relative to grain warehouses for and inspecting of said grain.

So that the entire $50,000 appropriated in the bill for cotton may be used for that, and the other sum of $50,000 may be used to cover the expenses of the amendment offered by my colleague. I am going to offer that as an amendment to the amendment which my colleague has offered.

Mr. President, it was with a degree of pleasure that I observed that Senators who have persistently voted against any character of inspection or grading for grain, which together with cotton constitutes the great wealth and production of the United States and which makes all our food and makes all our clothing, emphasized their consistency in this matter by voting for the Federal inspection and grading and certification of canned salmon. It indicates that the big things sometimes escape while the little things we pass on very easily.

I have not anything further to say, Mr. President, but I wish to have read into the RECORD at this time a letter which was received by me a short time ago from Nebraska, which will explain itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

EWART GRAIN CO., GRAIN AND ELEVATORS,
Lincoln, Nebr., August 6, 1914.

Hon. PORTER MCCUMBER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The public has been somewhat interested in your effort to put through legislation that will relieve the shippers of the rural districts from the unjust grading and handling of their grain in terminal markets. This injustice has never been more rank than it has been this summer. If you will confer with Senator NORRIS, you will find with him considerable correspondence from Nebraska on this subject. The shipper is subject to discounts of 4 cents and 5 cents per bushel on wheat, much of which should not be discounted at all.

Since the war scare these discounts in Chicago and Minneapolis have been unprecedented. The only relief that the public will have from this injustice is the supervision and inspection of grain by the Government. Some of the grain dealers of Lincoln are in conference this afternoon, going to the governor to see if something can not be done jointly with the governor of Minnesota to get relief from this confiscation of part of the value of the grain.

We believe that when you have again entered the fray for the desired legislation you will find that you have a large amount of support from people who had not been so much interested before.

It is common knowledge, and has been for years, that the ingrades and outgrades from terminal markets were not at all uniform, and grades that are put out from these markets as No. 2, for instance, were graded as No. 3 when they came in.

Pardon my intrusion on your valuable time, but the imposition is becoming more and more galling.

Yours, truly,
S. EWART.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I simply want to say a word. The amendment which I offer simply provides that the Secretary of Agriculture may license grain warehouses. It places grain on an equality with cotton. It is entirely different from the bill which my colleague has had before the Senate for many years. I favor his bill, as he knows. I wish it were possible for us to pass my colleague's bill, but that is an entirely different proposition, as the Chair has ruled, and, as I think, rightly so.

Mr. President, I do not believe it is wise to ask for an appropriation in my amendment. I believe that that can be taken care of in conference, in case there is any necessity for an increase in the appropriation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have been given to understand until recently that we were being held here during the sweltering months of summer for the purpose of taking care of certain great legislative problems, which it was felt ought to be disposed of before this session of Congress adjourned. Coming upon the heels of that were certain emergency matters made necessary by virtue of the unfortunate conditions existing abroad and the interference with our own domestic affairs naturally resulting from those European conditions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will it interrupt the Senator if I ask him a question concerning a matter not directly relevant to the one under discussion?

Mr. REED. It would not interrupt me.

Mr. GALLINGER. Some months ago, when I chanced to have the honor for a brief time conferred upon me of acting as President pro tempore of the Senate, the Senator from Missouri offered a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee of Senators to take into consideration the better ventilation of the Senate Chamber. Acting in my capacity I appointed a committee, of which the Senator was made chairman. I have been wondering ever since if the Senator, or the other Senators, have given any serious consideration to the question as to whether or not, if we are to be kept here during the torrid months, we might not have some better ventilation in this Chamber, so as to make us a little more comfortable.

I feared I might forget to ask the question later on, when, perhaps, it would have been more appropriate, but I thought the Senator would not object to my asking it now, and I thank him for giving me that privilege.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the question is a very proper one. The committee met on two or three occasions and had some consultations with the Architect of the Capitol. The Architect of the Capitol was of the opinion that in order to make any change which would be effective it would be necessary to take the matter up when Congress would not be in session and when there would be considerable time permitted to make the changes. He suggested two general plans, one of which he was asked to work out. He did work out that plan, in part at least, and brought the result of his labors to me. I say "he brought the result"; he brought it in part at least. I then endeavored to get meetings of the committee, but from that day to this the Senate has been so driven with work that I have not been able to find it possible to get the committee together. However, I have not made a strenuous effort, because it has been perfectly manifest that the Senate would be in session for a considerable time, and until the Senate adjourns we can not, of course, carry on any work of improvement. The matter, however, has not been forgotten, and I am glad the Senator called my attention and the Senate's attention to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am gratified to know that the committee has the matter still in mind. I realize that the improvements, whatever they might be, could not be made while Congress is in session, but I want to emphasize the fact that if we are to be kept here during the summer months—and I am making no complaint about that—if it is possible to improve the air of this Chamber it ought to be done; that is all.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I agree with that; but as near as I am able to make out we are hereafter to be in perpetual session. I know of no better illustration than this amendment. We had something like a six weeks' battle in the Senate at this session over the question of grain inspection. The proposition then before the Senate was essentially the proposition now brought forward. It came before the Senate in two forms and was debated at great length. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] himself occupied the floor the greater part of 10 days, as nearly as I can recall, and after the bill was defeated I think he occupied about 3 days lecturing the Senate for having voted as it did. After all that, if my recollection serves me aright, he brought in another and different amendment, which was practically the same old Trojan horse with a different coat of paint, and now it is here before us again in all its essentials. It differs from the bill which we voted upon twice, exactly as two grains of calomel differ from a grain and a quarter. It is exactly the same kind of medicine; the dose is administered in a little smaller degree. I claim that a proper application of the rules of the Senate will exclude this amendment from consideration, or else it is true that a Senator can continue to bring forward by amendments the same essential proposition as many times as he desires to bring it forward, provided he changes the phraseology to some slight extent. I insist that it is not permissible under the rules of the Senate.

Let me illustrate that and endeavor to show how necessary it is that there should be some limitation and that that limitation should be a broad and practical one and not merely a technical one. Suppose that the Senate were now to vote upon this cotton-inspection bill, and, after full debate, were to defeat it; suppose that immediately there should be introduced another bill exactly—if I knew just how far the Chair had followed my statement when I was interrupted, for I am making this argument to the Chair——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Missouri that the Chair has ruled; but if there is an appeal from the Chair, he will gladly put the appeal to the Senate.

Mr. REED. I was hoping to enlist the attention of the Chair because of the interest of the matter I am discussing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair listened, he thinks, about 17 or 18 days to debate on the grain bill, and the Chair has not any doubt that the amendment is not the same as that bill.

Mr. REED. Very well. I insist—and I shall take my own time to insist, whether it be pleasing or displeasing—that this amendment can not now be properly considered. I was proceeding to illustrate: Suppose that this cotton bill were now defeated; suppose, immediately, some Member of the Senate were to introduce another cotton-inspection bill, changing the amount of the appropriation from $50,000 to $55,000, and were then to ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill which had been once before voted upon and determined at this session, it would not be the same bill; it would be a different bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, the Chair does not want the Senator from Missouri to get into any attitude of mind like that, because, under what the Chair thinks is well settled parliamentary procedure, the Chair would be compelled to sustain the point of order on the part of the Senator from Missouri on a bill of that kind. The Chair does not want to be put in that attitude. The changing of amount and the changing of phraseology or the changing of anything else would not lead the Chair to decide the point of order was not well taken; but the Chair, after listening week after week, thinking the discussion would never end on the grain-inspection bill, has a distinct recollection that the purpose of the bill of the Senator from North Dakota was to take away from the States and to put into the control of the Federal Government the inspection of the grain of this country, and to provide for a uniform inspection of grain throughout the United States of America. The Chair can not be mistaken in that view of the bill.

The Chair does not understand that such is the purpose of the amendment. It seems to be the whole purpose of the original bill here and of the amendment to enable the owners of various products of America to procure certificates relative thereto by the Government of the United States, and that they may use such certificates for the purpose of obtaining money. It is therein the Chair thinks, with deference to the opinion of the Senator from Missouri, the difference between the two bills consists.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I undertake to say that we should apply the broad rule that when a subject matter has been disposed of that same subject matter can not be brought forward in a bill for the purpose of accomplishing substantially the same results at the same session. I am not entering into a controversy with the Chair about this matter; I am addressing myself as I discuss these questions to the Senate as well as to the Chair, because the Senate ought to protect itself against a performance of this kind; it ought to protect itself against it upon the broad ground that it does not intend to be harassed with the same subject matter simply because of the pertinacity of Senators who bring it forward in a slightly different way.

What was the bill upon which we voted? It provided that the Secretary of Agriculture should be authorized and required, as soon as may be, "to determine and fix, according to such standards as he may provide, such classifications and grading of wheat, flax, corn, rye, oats, barley, and other grains as in his judgment the usages of trade may warrant and permit."

It provided further:

SEC. 6. That when such standards are fixed and the classification and grades determined upon the same shall be made matter of permanent record in the Agricultural Department, and public notice thereof shall be given.

Then it provided that the inspector should give certain certificates, and so forth. That was about all there was in the bill, except that it provided that all grain should be inspected that crossed from one State to another. It was afterwards amended so that it only included grain that should pass through terminal points. Subsequent to that there was an amendment offered by the Senator of a much narrower nature, which I trust I shall have here in a few moments. It was an amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota at a later time in the session after the bill to which I have been referring was defeated.

The kernel, however, of those measures, the thing that was in those measures, was the proposition of a Federal inspection of grain instead of a State inspection of grain. The details as to just how it was to be worked out were not of the essentials of the bill. That bill finds its chief distinction from the present bill in the fact that that bill was compulsory, while this bill is voluntary, so far as elevator men are concerned.

The principal objection to that bill was that it destroyed State grain inspection; and the same objection exactly lies to this amendment. This amendment, in my opinion, will just as effectively destroy State grain inspection as the original bill would have done, and if this amendment is put on this bill, I think it will be some weeks before the bill comes to a vote.

A contest was made before, the whole question was argued out, the facts and figures were massed, and the Senate, by a decisive vote, settled it. Now, we are asked to lay aside trust legislation, which, we are told, is most important, to lay aside appropriation bills, which are important, and to take up and thrash out this same old question. I have no great interest in it except as it affects my State; and if the Senator who offers the amendment will put at the end of his amendment a clause providing that it shall not apply to States having State inspection, I shall not resist the measure; but if he does not do that, I shall be compelled to offer such an amendment. I wish to ask the Senator if he will do that?

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I can not at this time accept such an amendment. We have no State grain inspection at all in the State of North Dakota, and neither do we dispose of our grain in North Dakota. Our grain is disposed of either at Minneapolis, Duluth, or some other grain terminal. I can not understand how the Senator from Missouri can construe this amendment to be an inspection provision. I want to ask the Senator from Missouri, if he will permit me, if he believes that the elevator men of his State are in favor of Federal inspection; and if they are not, how can he construe this amendment to provide for Federal inspection? It is only upon the application of the elevator men that inspection can be had.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator has asked me a question, which I apprehend he thinks goes to the merits of this matter, but I do not agree with him. In every State there are proprietors of elevators and men engaged in the grain business who are not satisfied with the State inspection. They would like very much to have an inspection which they could dictate, and of course the more honest the State inspection and the more careful and competent such inspection the more will men of that kind object to it.

If you pass this bill, the authority of the State grain-inspection departments will be destroyed, and for this reason: Any man who is dissatisfied with the State grain inspection can ask for Federal inspection and take himself out from under the authority of the State board. Now I desire to ask the Senator a question. His question implies that all of the State grain elevators will want to stay under State inspection.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. I will.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator perhaps knows more about State inspection than I do, but he also knows, and I know, that State inspection is compulsory. This amendment does not provide for a compulsory inspection; nor do I believe any inspection can be had under it except for the purpose of licensing an elevator or a warehouse.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, answering one thing at a time, the Senator's position is that this will not interfere with State grain inspection, because the elevators will prefer the State grain inspection to the national inspection. If that is true, then why not add the clause which I have suggested and which exempts from the operation of this law States where there is State inspection and public inspection by public authorities? If, on the other hand, it will make a difference, as I maintain it will make a difference, then I have cause to complain.

Now, Mr. President, it will make a difference. There are in every community men who do not want their grain inspected by the State authorities and who have constantly endeavored to prevent a thorough and honest inspection. If you adopt this amendment, all those men have to do to get out from under the State authority is to bring themselves under the national authority, and when the national authority has stepped in, as we all know, the State steps out. If this is a proper subject for Congressional action, then the moment an elevator asks to be licensed by the Federal Government, and is licensed, the State authorities lose control over that elevator. All elevators in States where they have grain inspection can immediately come under national inspection.

An examination of this bill will make that plain. I read now from the cotton bill, section 3:

> That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate the storage, warehousing, and certification of cotton; upon application to him, to inspect warehouses or cause them to be inspected; at any time, with or without application to him, to inspect or cause to be inspected all warehouses licensed under this act—
>
> Upon application he can inspect any warehouse, and with or without application he can inspect a warehouse licensed under this act. He is authorized—> to determine whether warehouses for which licenses are applied for, or have been issued, under this act are suitable for the proper storage or holding of cotton; to classify warehouses in accordance with their location, surroundings, capacity, condition, and other qualities, and the kinds of licenses issued, or that may be issued, to them pursuant to this act; and to prescribe the duties of warehouses licensed under this act with respect to the care of cotton stored or held therein.

Then the remainder of the bill proceeds to give very broad powers, and section 6 provides—

> That the Secretary of Agriculture may, upon presentation to him of satisfactory proof of competency, issue to any person a license to grade or classify cotton, and to certificate the grade or class thereof, under such rules and regulations as may be made pursuant to this act.

That is not limited to a licensed warehouse; that is not limited to cotton that is put in a warehouse; that is as broad as the cotton fields of the South; it has no limitation at all. I have no objection to it as applied to cotton. I am perfectly willing that this cotton bill shall go through, but now comes the Senator from North Dakota and offers an amendment which provides—

> That all the provisions of this act are hereby extended to include elevators and warehouses for the storage of grain and flaxseed, together with inspection, classification, and issuance of receipts and certificates, to the same extent, so far as applicable, as the same are specifically made applicable to warehouses for the storage and classification of cotton, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe.

The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized under section 6 to appoint any number of men to inspect cotton anywhere in the country. He is authorized to license any number of elevators anywhere to store cotton. He is authorized to inspect the cotton in the elevator and to inspect the cotton outside of the elevator. It is now proposed to extend those powers to grain elevators. Accordingly, we are authorizing the Secretary of Agriculture to appoint any number of men to inspect grain. We are authorizing them to inspect that grain anywhere, at any place, and we are authorizing the licensing of warehouses when application is made. Adopt that system——

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Just one moment, until I finish the sentence. Adopt that system, and you will have destroyed the State grain-inspection departments of this country. You will have made it so that any rebel displeased with a ruling can immediately say, "Well, I will take a change of venue from you to the Government."

When the Government has come in to license these departments and the Government has taken over this business, it is my opinion that the mere fact that the Government does take it over wipes out the State grain-inspection departments altogether, so far as interstate commerce is concerned.

I do not believe you can have two authorities running side by side and each of them controlling interstate commerce. When once the Government has entered upon the field of regulation and inspection of grains, and so forth, going through interstate commerce, the two authorities are not consistent with each other; and, under the cases that have been so often referred to here, when any matter pertaining to interstate commerce is once taken hold of by the Federal Government, the States lose their jurisdiction and authority. When you set up a system of national inspection and provide that every elevator in the United States can come under it, and provide further that wheat and other grain can be inspected anywhere, and that the Secretary of Agriculture may appoint any number of men he may see fit to inspect that grain, in my opinion, the State grain inspection ends the minute you pass that kind of bill, unless you put in a qualifying clause excepting the States that have grain inspection.

I am speaking upon this matter without preparation and without examination of the authorities, but I give that as my judgment. At least, it is clear to me that a very dangerous question is opened up.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GRONNA. I hardly think the fears of the Senator from Missouri are well founded in that respect. This bill nowhere authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to standardize grain. It is very reasonable to suppose that the Secretary of Agriculture would make use of State grain inspection, and that he would accept that inspection. It simply gives the farmer who produces grain or who produces flaxseed the same privilege that the cotton farmer will have. It places him on an equality with the cotton farmer to say that if he has grain in an elevator or a warehouse the Secretary of Agriculture permits the issuance of a receipt for it, and the farmer can take that receipt and use it as he sees fit—borrow money upon it or sell it, as he may desire.

Mr. REED. No; the cotton bill goes very much further than the Senator states. This is not a case of the Government inspecting wheat when it is requested. This is a case of the Government licensing a warehouse, licensing an elevator, and making it a Government agency.

Mr. GRONNA. But the Senator must not overlook the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture is not permitted under this bill to standardize grain or to fix grades. That will be left to the State.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; he is permitted to standardize grain and fix grades, because you have provided in the cotton bill that he shall standardize and fix grades, and you have provided in your amendment that all of the provisions of the cotton bill shall, so far as applicable, be applied to grain. Surely you have brought in the standardization and fixing of grades. If the Senator has not done that, his amendment is a meaningless thing; and I am sure the Senator did not intend to draw that sort of an amendment. He is not accustomed to doing it.

I read from the bill:

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of Agriculture may, upon presentation to him of satisfactory proof of competency, issue to any person a license to grade or classify cotton, and to certificate the grade or class thereof, under such rules and regulations as may be made pursuant to this act.

Now, applying that to grain, this is the way it would read:

That the Secretary of Agriculture may, upon presentation to him of satisfactory proof of competency, issue to any person a license to grade or classify grain, and to certificate the grade or class thereof, under such rules and regulations as may be made pursuant to this act.

There is no escaping the proposition that this amendment proposes to grade and classify grain.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. STERLING. Does the Senator think section 6 is to be construed so as to apply generally to the grading or classifying of cotton, or only to those warehouses that have applied for the Government license?

Mr. REED. I think it applies generally.

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator that I think section 6 must be read in connection with the other provisions of the bill; that the authorization pertains only to those warehouses that apply for the license. There are so many of those provisions that I think section 6 can be read only with these in view. The bill does not give the Secretary authority to provide for the grading and classification of cotton generally. The same principle would apply to grain. It is purely optional with any warehouse or any elevator to apply for this Government license. It becomes, under the provisions of the bill, a bonded warehouse, whereas, with reference to the McCumber bill, it provided for a general Federal inspection of all grain in interstate commerce, and made it compulsory. I think there is a radical difference between the two measures, and a radical difference between the McCumber bill and the amendment now proposed by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator at all. I will come back to that question in a moment. I am talking now about the right to fix Government grades. I read section 9:

That any warehouse receipt or certificate of the grade or class of cotton issued under this act may specify the grade or class of the cotton covered thereby in accordance with the official cotton standards of the United States, as the same may be fixed and promulgated under authority of law from time to time by the Secretary of Agriculture, or in accordance with any other standard.

Now, substitute the word "grains" for the word "cotton," and you will observe at once that it is contemplated to fix Government standards of grain, and it was clearly the purpose of the Senator in offering his amendment to carry that provision over to the grain business, just as it is now carried to the cotton business.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. GRONNA. It is hardly necessary for me to suggest to the Senator from Missouri that the Secretary of Agriculture now has the right to standardize grain. We have a law now which authorizes the United States Department of Agriculture to fix standards of grain.

Mr. REED. He can fix grades, but he has no authority to enforce those grades.

Mr. GRONNA. None whatever.

Mr. REED. That is the very matter we battled over here for about 17 weeks, and that the Senator from North Dakota is now bringing up again.

Mr. GRONNA. But not for the purpose of selling, nor does this give him the authority to standardize grain for the purpose of selling.

Mr. REED. No; but you standardize it, and then you sell it. You have simply brought in the same old horse, only you have shaved his tail and cut off his mane and painted him; but he is the same horse, and you have got him back on the track, only in this instance you have a different rider.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say frankly to the Senator from Missouri that I wish it were the same horse, but it is not.

Mr. REED. Well, he is a little spavined now.

Mr. GRONNA. I will say further that the Senator from Missouri will find that the so-called McCumber grain bill will again come before the Senate, regardless of whether this bill is passed or not.

Mr. REED. I have no doubt of it; but what I object to is having it brought here every day. I think there ought to be a period of rest allowed. I think when you beat a thing at one session of Congress, and the right to move to reconsider has been exhausted, it ought not to be brought up again at that session of Congress. It ought to be allowed to rest until there are at least some new men here, and thus the result might be changed. I understand the Senator means to bring it up. I have no doubt he intends to bring it up, and I know from the warlike glitter in the eyes of his colleague that he intends to bring it up, and that we will have it with us, like the poor, always, until nature shall solve the problem by the removal of the contestants, or until success shall crown the efforts of these very persistent gentlemen.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is always fair, and I am sure he will admit that under the provisions of this bill not a single bushel of grain could be standardized by the Government of the United States where there is State inspection.

Mr. REED. I simply can not admit it, because it is my judgment that the Government of the United States has the power, if it sees fit to exercise it, to require every bushel of grain shipped from one State to another to be inspected by a Government agent, and that when it enters upon the exercise of that power it is very likely the courts will say that the Government having started to exercise that power, the jurisdiction of the States over interstate grain is thereby ended. I do not give that as a final conclusion, but it is the way the matter strikes me this morning. Of course I did not know that the amendment of the Senators would be offered until a few minutes ago, when it was offered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator how grain in a warehouse, until something is being done toward its transportation to another State, can be called in any way interstate grain? And how could the Government official get hold of it, under the theory that it was interstate grain, and inspect it while it was still lying idle in a warehouse?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the very thing the Senator for days argued here was that if the bill which he had before the Senate at that time was enacted into law the Government could take hold of each of these great elevators and stop what he claimed was the practice of grading in the grain at one grade and grading it out at another. The very purpose of his whole legislation was to do the very thing the Senator now says could not be done.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator will not do me the injustice to assume that I do not understand the general rules relating to interstate commerce and when an article begins to be an article of interstate commerce. He will find, I think, by a closer inspection of the bill, that it covered only that which was shipped from one State to another or was being transported from one State to another after it had been once purchased in a State. I admitted all the way through that we could not touch grain in a State that was raised there. I admitted that we could not touch it unless it came from a foreign State, and we could only reach it as it applied to grain which had become a matter of interstate traffic, and we could not touch it again until it had become interstate traffic again.

Mr. REED. Then the Senator argues too much. If grain going into an elevator can not be touched by the Government as a matter of right, because it is not then in interstate traffic, the Government has no business to have anything whatever to do with that elevator; it has no right to inspect anything with relation to it. You can not have both sides of this question. Either the Government has the right to inspect or it has not. If it has the right and power to inspect and exercise it, it does it to the exclusion of the State. If it does not have the power to inspect, then we have no right to provide for a voluntary inspection, because the Government is engaged in a business that does not concern it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, the Government has no right to inspect a farmer's hog on his place to see whether he has cholera or not, and the moment that the Government official does inspect it he is going outside the governmental authority. But we gave the authority to do that when the farmer presents his pig to be inspected by the Government.

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. McCUMBER. It does not prevent the right of the Government to inspect if the party owning the article is willing to have it inspected.

Mr. REED. The Government inspects hogs in the exercise of its police power upon the theory that it wants to prevent the spread of contagious disease among animals that are constantly being shipped in interstate commerce. Consequently it has very broad rights along that line. But I do not understand the position taken by the Senators who ask this amendment. I want to state their position fairly. They seem to take the position that the Government has the right to inspect all grain if it see fit to do so, provided that grain is in interstate commerce in any way. They seem, then, to take the position that the Government has not the right to inspect any grain at all lying in an elevator, although the bill they have heretofore had before Congress for the inspection and handling of grain provided specifically, if I remember correctly, for taking charge practically of the elevators.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to correct the Senator, if he will allow me. The bill which I introduced nowhere provides for inspection in the elevators. It proposes to inspect the grain while it is still in interstate commerce in the car, before it is delivered to the elevator. It proposes to inspect the grain when it passes out of the elevator and takes its first step into interstate trade again.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the bill very plainly provided for the inspection of all grain that reached terminals, and the bill as originally before the Senate provided for the inspection of all grain going from one State to another. That, of course, implies the inspection of grain in elevators. There can not be any question about that proposition.

I am not going to take the time of the Senate now to argue this question. I simply say this to the few Senators who are here: This amendment is not offered for the same reason that the bill is brought forward. The bill is brought forward as an emergency measure to cover the case of the cotton planters of the South, and as amended to cover the tobacco raisers of the country, in order that those men who appear to have no satisfactory system of inspection may have an inspection and may have a Government certificate which will enable them to realize—I take it this is the purpose—upon those certificates some money until the highways of the ocean can be opened and until their production may find——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Until foreign trade may be once more in operation.

Mr. REED. Yes; and until the factories are once more in operation in European and other countries. That may be a very good and sound proposition for those products, because, first, there is some interference with the commerce across the ocean, although I think in 30 days that will be practically a thing of the past.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. If the Senator will allow me to proceed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. REED. But I think there is more interference in the matter of manufacturing abroad, and that applies particularly to cotton. There will be a time, probably, during which it will be necessary to hold the cotton in order that the mills may turn it into cloth. But that does not apply at all to wheat.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. It does not apply to wheat, and I am about to give the reason.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply wanted to ask the Senator if he is aware of the fact that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] introduced a bill exactly along the line of my amendment, which applies to grain? I sent the bill over to the Senator, and it is on his desk. The Senator stated on Saturday that he hoped that the two could be embodied together and passed.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Oklahoma said that, but I might not agree with the Senator from Oklahoma. I am discussing the question of emergency. There is no such emergency applying to the wheat business at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? Suppose we should add a paragraph to the bill providing that it should cease to be operative six months after the conclusion of war between Great Britain and Germany, or that it should have a duration of not longer than two years; would that remove the Senator's objection?

Mr. REED. I would just want to add that it shall not apply to a State having efficient State inspection, because we have better inspection in the State of Missouri to-day than the Government of the United States will ever set up.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I was simply trying to avoid the issue between the Senators interested in grain. So far as I am concerned, I would be perfectly willing to add a paragraph limiting the operation of the bill to the present emergency condition that confronts the country, growing out of the European war. Indeed, I am disposed to offer such an amendment myself, in any event, a provision limiting the duration of the bill to 18 months, or 6 months after the conclusion of peace between Great Britain and Germany. The Senator is right in supposing that what I was seeking in this bill is not general legislation, to be effective at all times, but it is to meet a great emergency caused by the unfortunate condition of war which exists in foreign countries.

Mr. REED. I am sorry, Mr. President, that I did not object to the consideration of this bill when I had the right to object. I thought, however, it could come in here as a measure that would affect in the cotton-growing States that great staple, which we all want to protect and which is under a special hardship at this time. But as soon as it comes in we begin to load it down with everything else we can conceive of, whether there is an emergency or not. There is an absolute interference, of course, with the cotton business. The carrying business is interfered with, but I think that will speedily be out of the way. I have not any doubt that the commercial lanes will be opened and kept open within a very short time so that commerce will flow almost unobstructed to certain European ports. But there is an interference growing out of the fact that undoubtedly for the time being the great mills of Europe will be totally or partially paralyzed. But that is not true of the grain business, and I will tell you why it is not true.

In the first place, every human being has to eat, war or no war, and the one thing that he can not do without is the product of the grains of the world. We can grind practically all our grains in this country, so that the manufacturing would not cease at all even if the mills of Europe were stopped. The last thing in the world that will be stopped are the mills that grind flour. But even if they were stopped abroad the mills in this country can handle substantially all the grains of the country. But the mills of Europe will not stop. They would take the soldiers out of their armies before they would stop making breadstuffs. There is therefore no emergency with reference to grain.

The enactment of this bill may not be necessary for the cotton men, but the enactment of the bill is not necessary to the grain business. We might as well discuss this matter frankly. Having been twice defeated at this session of Congress in their attempt to have Government inspection of grain, our friends with a courage and persistence that is almost commendable, which would be commendable I think at any other season of the year or in any other temperature than this, have simply brought forward their hobbyhorse and say, "Now hook him up in this team that is being sent out on an emergency; and we propose to have him dragged through by the sheer force of the power that is back of an emergency measure."

Mr. President, we have put everything into the bill that can be thought of thus far, and I presume Senators think they ought to be able to put in corn and wheat. We have got tobacco in now, we have the salmon from the western coast in, and if this is going to be kept up I think we ought to extend it so that it will cover the products of all States. As I sat here and witnessed the action of the Senate in putting in the canned salmon of the Pacific coast I wondered if I was not neglecting my duty when I did not insist on putting in Missouri River cat. Mr. President, I could tell a very plaintive story about that much-abused fish. He is born absolutely without the slightest governmental protection or aid. There is no Government agent even overlooking the hatcheries in which the spawn of that delectable and edible saurian is cast upon the waters.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment? I am going to offer an amendment, and I want to read it while he is on the floor.

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will not interrupt my dissertation on catfish.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Excuse me; I thought the Senator had finished on the cat.

Mr. REED. I had a beautiful vision before my mind that I was about to lay before the Senate of the wrongs of the Missouri River catfish, but it is disturbed now by this inharmonious note, and I will permit the Senator to offer his amendment or to read it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I regret that I disturbed the Senator in discussing one of the great commodities of Missouri.

Mr. REED. The country has lost something.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This is what I have drawn:

That the provisions of this bill shall only remain in force for nine months after peace is made between Great Britain and Germany, and in no event longer than two years.

Mr. GALLINGER. It should read "the provisions of this act," I suggest to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; "the provisions of this act."

Mr. GALLINGER. At the proper time I shall want to be heard on the proposed amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. On this amendment?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; and on several others.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will offer it a little later. I just suggest it. I do not formally offer it now.

Mr. REED. Abandoning the poetic theme of the Missouri River catfish and coming to the sordid things of this earth, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that his amendment ought to be changed perhaps so that it would read, "and in no event longer than two years from and after the passage of this act." That, of course, is a proper amendment to the main bill. I think it, perhaps, ought to go on it. I am not concerned in the question of cotton except as I find men from that section of the country say that an emergency exists. No emergency exists in regard to grain. We voted for it twice, I think thrice, at this session and I insist that the amendment ought to be voted down. If it is not voted down it will be necessary to debate this question for some time.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, just one word with reference to the view of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I can not help but think that he takes the extreme view in regard to these two measures, the McCumber bill and the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to the pending bill.

The Senator himself discloses in his statement as to what is not contained in the bill the difference, and the radical difference, between the two measures. After perusing or appearing to peruse the original McCumber bill for some time the Senator said he was satisfied that it provided for the inspection of grain in elevators. I want to call the attention of the Senator to section 9 of the McCumber bill.

Mr. REED. Which bill is it?

Mr. STERLING. Page 5.

Mr. REED. Of what date? There are two bills.

Mr. STERLING. The bill of May 20, 1914.

Mr. REED. That is the second bill, is it not?

Mr. STERLING. I am not sure as to that, but I think the same provision is in the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator that the provision is the same in Senate bill 120.

Mr. STERLING. I thought the provisions were the same in the two bills.

SEC. 9. That it shall be the duty of said inspectors to inspect and grade all grain arriving or collected at any of the aforesaid grain centers and which at the time of inspecting and grading of the same has been shipped from any other State, Territory, or country than the State, Territory, or country in which the same is inspected, or is intended for shipment into any other State, Territory, or foreign country before the same is unloaded from the car, vessel, or other vehicle in which the same was or is being transported—

And so forth.

So it excludes altogether the idea of inspection in the warehouse or in the elevator.

The Senator from Missouri is willing to support the original bill on the ground that a necessity exists with reference to the one product—cotton. He says no necessity whatever exists in regard to grain. I wonder if the Senator can state how many millions of bushels of wheat will be for export this year in the United States. I can not state it exactly, but I ought. From what I know of the production there will not be less this year than 100,000,000 bushels of wheat for exportation.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STERLING. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator did not read all the section he referred to. On page 6, in the copy I have, he will find the following proviso:

Provided, however, That such inspector, upon request of the owner or agent of any grain at the point or place where an inspector may be located, whether or not the grain has entered into interstate commerce, shall inspect the same and deliver his certificate therefor in the same manner as other inspections are made and for the same charge; and whenever the owner of grain at such place shall request and furnish facilities therefor, said inspector shall also weigh such grain and deliver to the owner or his agent his certificate showing the gross and net weight of such grain, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Does the Senator not understand that under that a man having an elevator may have his grain inspected?

Mr. STERLING. I do not understand any such thing from the reading of that proviso, but that is covered by the original provision that it shall be inspected before it is unloaded from the car. Nothing in the portion of the bill read by the Senator excludes that idea.

As I was about to say, I think perhaps there will be a hundred million bushels of wheat for export this year. Why may not the same emergency——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. STERLING. If the Senator will excuse me, why may not the same emergency exist with reference to the exportation of wheat and in getting it to a foreign market as there will be for southern cotton, not to the same extent, because I understand you export 60 per cent of the total product of cotton, and we will export this year, say, 100,000,000 bushels of wheat?

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me correct the Senator there. If the crop is such as it is estimated, we will export in flour and wheat the equivalent of over 300,000,000 bushels.

Mr. STERLING. That may be. I was speaking of wheat alone, without reference to flour.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I wished to say to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. So the market for wheat and all other grain may be depressed because of the lack of facilities for transportation, just as the market for cotton would be depressed, and the farmer and producer would suffer loss on that account. So I think, Mr. President, perhaps not to the same great degree as in the case of cotton, but he may suffer to a great extent, and the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota is surely reasonable in the light of our conditions.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator takes his seat, he construes the language which I read on page 6 as being governed by the language which preceded it, which was that the grain should be inspected before it is unloaded. I do not think that construction is correct, but in order to show the Senator that the purview of the bill is not at all limited to the inspection of grain before it is unloaded from the cars, but that there is a provision governing the grain after it leaves the cars, I call his attention to sections 12 and 13:

SEC. 12. That when any grain which having been inspected and certificate of inspection issued hereunder is mixed with any other grain not inspected or with grain which has been inspected and certified at a different grade, at such terminals, the same shall not be shipped out of the State where such mixing is done without being reinspected and graded.

The very term "mixing" implies going into an elevator. It implies that grain has been unloaded and has gone into an elevator, and before you can take it out to ship it anywhere you must have it inspected.

And so also section 13:

SEC. 13. That the shipment or consignment of any grain aforesaid from any of the places mentioned herein to another State or foreign country without the same being inspected and graded as herein provided is hereby prohibited; but where grain has been once inspected hereunder, and remains unmixed with other grain, the same need not be reinspected at the place from which it is exported.

The two taken together clearly imply and clearly were intended to govern the idea of grains being inspected in elevators after they had been unloaded, taken into the elevator, and there mixed with other grain.

Mr. STERLING. As I read the section referred to by the Senator it applies to a special case and it is outside of the general rule. Section 12:

That when any grain which having been inspected and certificate of inspection issued hereunder is mixed with any other grain not inspected or with grain which has been inspected and certified at a different grade, at such terminals, the same shall not be shipped out of the State where such mixing is done without being reinspected and graded.

And that does not say that it shall be inspected in the elevator at all or while in the elevator.

Mr. REED. But that is just where it would be inspected, as it came from the elevator. Now, the Senator wants to be fair about this, I know.

Mr. STERLING. Certainly.

Mr. REED. And he understands perfectly well that the Senator from North Dakota stood here on his feet for days conplaining that grain went into the elevator graded one way and came out the other, and he insisted that what he did want was a grading of the grain that would be a permanent grading by the Government.

Mr. President, when grain goes into the elevator everybody knows that it may justly go in as one grade and justly come out as another, because in the meantime the grade may have been improved. Accordingly, it follows that the whole of this legislation was intended to cover the grain not only in the cars but the grain in the elevators and the grain in place. But if the Senator can show me that there is a necessity for the issuance of warehouse receipts against grain under Government inspection at this time, that there is an emergency of that kind existing, I shall be perfectly willing to see a bill passed that will cover that question.

So far as my State is concerned, where we have State grain inspection, it has been the custom for years, when the grain has been graded and put in an elevator and the warehouse certificate issued against it, that warehouse certificate is as good bankable paper as you want. We have no difficulty whatever about it. I do not want that system interfered with or broken up.

There is no necessity in my State whatever—there may be in the Senator's—for any Government brand in order to enable our grain dealers to get money upon their grain. State grain inspection and a warehouse certificate are all that are necessary, and upon that certificate you can borrow almost 100 cents on the dollar.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, wherein will this bill injure the grain-inspection business in the Senator's State? It is the purpose of the bill to afford relief to those who can not and do not wish to sell now at the depressed price of grain due to war conditions, because of the difficulties in exportation; but if the certificate of the warehouse or elevator in his State is such a certificate as will enable him to procure money upon it, the Senator does not want anything better, and it will only be in a rare case, perhaps, when under the terms of this bill an elevator or warehouse man may, at his option, seek to have the Government license. Perhaps none will seek to have such license. Then it will not hurt the Senator's State, but will apply to those States where they have no State grain-inspection system, and perhaps to some rare case where they do have such a system but where somebody or some company feels they would like to have the Government's certificate as to the grade of the grain.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that I have already stated two reasons. One is that when the State inspectors proceed about their business in the proper way there is always some man ready to dispute their authority, and the adoption of this provision would afford him a chance to say, "Well, I will not have any State inspection; I will get a Government inspection and will disregard your board."

I also called attention to the graver question, that if the Government starts upon the matter of inspecting grain in interstate traffic, that right, having been exercised by the Government, will be exclusive of the rights of the States, and, in my opinion, will wipe out every State inspection board there is unless they are excepted. Why do the Senators object to excepting them?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, as to the first objection made by the Senator from Missouri, to the effect that somebody in his State would find fault with the State grain-inspection system and take advantage of this legislation, I say it would be a very trifling matter, as it seems to me, and the disadvantages that would arise in the Senator's own State would be so few and inconsequential compared to the greater advantages that would accrue to the people of other States and to the country at large that they could easily submit to any such disadvantages in order that we might have this general system.

Mr. President, as to the second objection made by the Senator, it seems to me, under the statement made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and under the amendment which he proposes to introduce, and which will be supported by those who are advocating the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota, that there can be nothing in his second objection. The amendment of the Senator from North Dakota does not contemplate in any sense a general Federal grain-inspection system; it is limited, first, by the particular emergency of war and the lack of transportation facilities, and, second, by the time limit put upon it in the proposed amendment.

Mr. REED. But in the meantime the State grain-inspection system is wiped out for two years or for whatever length of time the war lasts.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator that his State inspection system will be wiped out or interfered with under this proposed system. You can not put any such construction upon the amendment.

Mr. REED. I think that follows, although I say frankly I have not had the opportunity since this debate began this morning to examine the cases upon that to see how far they have gone; but I think it very dangerous.

Now, as to its effect in my own State, I trust the Senator who lives in the State of South Dakota will not undertake to tell me what the effect will be in my State, because we have there a State grain-inspection system, with which I am somewhat familiar, and I understand that in his State they do not have any inspection system at all.

Mr. President, the annoying thing about all this is that we are being harassed here by two States that do not have enough interest in the matter to establish a State inspection system of their own. They produce vast quantities of grain; they are splendid States; they have wide-awake citizens. Why do they not provide for an inspection of their own grain? Other States do it. The great State of Minnesota does it; Missouri does it; Kansas does it; and I might name a large number of other States which do it; but here sit the Dakotas, serene and silent, until they get down here to Congress, and then they want Congress to inspect their grain for them. Those States have a perfect right to establish a State grain-inspection system. Why do they not do so?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Let me ask the Senator if he would object to this——

Mr. STERLING. Just a moment. I have but a word further to say. We have a right to establish a State grain-inspection system, but, Mr. President, as has been indicated here already in the long debate which ensued on the McCumber grain-inspection bill, we are expecting and hoping for something better than a State grain-inspection system ultimately, and that will be a uniform Federal grain-inspection system, something for which we are not asking in this bill at all.

Mr. President, just this word: I disclaim any particular knowledge in regard to conditions in Missouri. I agree that the Senator from Missouri knows the situation in his own State, and knows it thoroughly. It is because I think his State grain-inspection system will not be injured or imperiled in any way by this system that I speak as I do and urge the adoption of this amendment. I hope that the Senator will see that no injury is threatened to his own State.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wanted to ask if what I am about to suggest would be objectionable to Senators. I am seeking, if possible, to heal the differences between the Senators from the grain States, and to avoid the consequences from their differences to that part of the bill which is not resisted. I suggest the following amendment:

SEC. 18. That none of the provisions of this act shall interfere with any system of inspection provided for in any State.

I merely suggest that to Senators to see if it is acceptable to them; if it would not relieve them from the differences that now separate them. I shall offer an amendment when I have an opportunity to do so, providing:

SEC. 19. That the provisions of this act shall remain of force for only nine months after a treaty of peace has been ratified between Great Britain and Germany, and in no event shall they remain of force longer than two years.

I shall offer that amendment; and if Senators agree to it, I suggest, as a means of saving the bill from the controversy that exists between them, the other amendment which I have indicated, as follows:

That none of the provisions of this act shall interfere with any system of inspection provided for in any State.

I understand that will avoid what the Senator from Missouri fears; and I understand also that the Senator from North Dakota does not desire that this legislation should interfere with any State inspection system. If that is what the Senator from Missouri fears, and that is not what the Senators from the Dakotas desire, then we might put this in express terms and remove the objection of both Senators and save the measure in which I am so much interested from the cross-fire to which it is subjected through there not being perfect agreement between the Senators from the grain States.

Mr. REED. What says the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I do not want to be misunderstood in regard to my position in this matter. I say now, as I previously said, that I fully believe the situation to be that this proposed legislation will not interfere with State grain-inspection system, but that it will simply permit anyone who is desirous of doing so, under the bill, to apply for a Government license; that is all.

Mr. REED. Well, if that is what the Senator believes will result, does the Senator accept the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. STERLING. I do not like to say that I accept that suggestion without conferring with or without hearing from the Senator from North Dakota, who originally introduced the amendment here.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the State inspection is as good as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has portrayed it to be, I can see no reason why we should place a limitation upon this language such as that proposed. I have said all the time that I believe—and I say it again—that this amendment will in no way create a Federal inspection system. The Secretary of Agriculture will not have the authority to establish a Federal inspection bureau, under this bill. As the Senator from Georgia has indicated he will introduce an amendment limiting the time to two years, and I have no objection to that amendment, I can see no reason why we should further place restrictions upon the amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Allow me to make this suggestion to the Senator: As this bill to be passed is to last only for two years, does he think it would be wise that we should by any possible construction of the measure interfere with established State systems that are to continue after this bill ceases to be of effect? I do not think it would; I do not understand that the bill is intended to apply except where the parties request a license; but as a question of doubt has arisen, does the Senator not really think that it would be wise to say that we do not intend to interfere with State inspection? We let that go on, but enact this bill as a supplemental matter.

Mr. GRONNA. I have implicit confidence in the Secretary of Agriculture; I do not believe that the great Secretary of Agriculture will make any mistake along that line. For that reason I can not see why this restriction should be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in other words, the Senators stand here and say that absolutely it will not interfere with the State system, but the minute it is proposed to put that in writing then they refuse to accept it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think if Senators will consider it they will not resist this amendment. This legislation does not interfere with the State inspection; we agree that it does not do so. If this legislation is to last for but two years, it ought not to interfere with systems of State inspection, and I do hope that Senators will not resist the amendment. I hope, therefore, Senators will accept the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I want to say that I am in favor of Federal grain inspection, so far as I am personally concerned, and to accept an amendment of that kind would be an indication that in everything that I have said heretofore I have been inconsistent. While, as I have said, I do not believe that the amendment I have offered could in any way be construed to mean Federal inspection of grain, I can not accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Would the Senator from North Dakota be willing before his amendment is voted upon for me first to test the sense of the Senate on the two amendments that I wish to offer from the committee? If they are adopted, I think there will be no opposition to his amendment; but if they are not adopted then we will have to continue the fight. The Senator from Missouri says that if the two amendments I have suggested are adopted he will make no further fight upon the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota. Therefore, if the Senator from North Dakota would withdraw temporarily his amendment and let me see whether or not the Senate will adopt the amendments I have indicated it will possibly facilitate action on his amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I can not withdraw my amendment. As I understand, I have no right to withdraw it. I shall be glad, however, to accept the amendment of the Senator from Georgia placing a limitation upon the time during which the measure is to be in force; I am sure there will be no objection to that amendment; but I do not care to withdraw the amendment I have offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota can withdraw his amendment and reoffer it, if he chooses to do so. That is within his power.

Mr. GRONNA. I will ask the Chair if I would lose any rights by so doing?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator would lose no rights whatever.

Mr. GRONNA. I agree, then, Mr. President, to withdraw the amendment which I offered, in order to allow the Senator from Georgia to offer the amendment which he has suggested, placing a limitation upon the time during which the measure is to be effective.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will stay here to see that the Senator from North Dakota is accorded his rights.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I tender first the amendment which I send to the desk.

The SECRETARY. At the appropriate place in the bill it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 19. That the provisions of this act shall remain of force for only nine months after a treaty of peace has been ratified between Great Britain and Germany, and in no event shall they remain of force longer than two years.

Mr. REED. From the date of the passage of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. From the date of the passage of the bill. I accept that suggestion, and ask that my amendment be so modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator why it is necessary that the measure should remain in force nine months after peace has been declared?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Well, the warehouses would be in operation, and it would probably take from six to nine months after peace is declared to dispose of the products and to terminate the then existing situation. Probably six months would be long enough, for as soon as trade becomes normal again the supervision would entirely cease. That was my original view; I first put it "six months," and then I thought possibly it would not be practicable to complete the work and to close out the certificates growing out of the Government action for nine months. Therefore I made it nine.

Mr. GALLINGER. Perhaps that is so, and I will not oppose the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, Mr. President, I offer the other amendment to which I have referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the proper place in the bill it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 18. That none of the provisions of this act shall interfere with any system of inspection provided for in any State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I hope that that amendment will not be adopted. I do not feel disposed to consume the time of the Senate and further delay the passage of the bill by discussing it, but I sincerely hope that it will be voted down. I can see no reason why we should not trust the Secretary of Agriculture with carrying out the provisions of this bill. The amendment first offered by the Senator from Georgia, and which has now been adopted, providing that in no event shall this measure remain in force for longer than two years, ought to be sufficient. I am not going to say anything more about this amendment, but I sincerely hope that it will be voted down.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I was not privileged to attend the sessions of the Senate on Saturday last, when this matter was discussed, and I have had little opportunity even to glance over the RECORD to see exactly what was proposed and what was accomplished. To my mind this is very extraordinary legislation.

Three weeks ago—and I am not about to divulge any secret, because a statement to the same effect was given out at the White House and published by the press of the country—three Members on this side of the Chamber were honored with an invitation to confer with the President. In that conference the President distinctly stated to us that he was interested in the bills which he named—the trade commission bill, the so-called Clayton bill, and the bill regulating the issuance of stocks and bonds by railroads. He made no suggestion that he would in any way undertake to keep the Congress in session beyond the time necessary for consideration of those bills. We came away from the conference, Mr. President, with the purpose of doing what we assured the President we would do, and that was not to obstruct, except by legitimate debate, the consideration of those important measures which the Chief Executive considered to be important. Since then one of those bills has been passed; a second one has been under consideration to a greater or lesser extent, but during that time we have been bombarded with so-called emergency measures. Pretty nearly everything that is offered now is an emergency bill, and I suppose we will continue to have emergency bills ad infinitum.

I do not pretend, Mr. President, to fully understand the emergency which exists for the passage of the bill now under consideration. I do know that we all would like to have our financial affairs taken charge of by the Government sufficiently to enable us to realize on our investments, whatever they may be. The men who have lost millions through investments in stocks and bonds I have no doubt would like to have the Government get behind those securities and enable them to recoup their losses, or at least to get their money out of the investments which they have made and which in many instances have been very unfortunate. Our manufacturers, who are now running as best they can, piling up textiles, boots and shoes, and other commodities, the trade being greatly interrupted because of the war, would doubtless like to have the Government authorize them to build sheds and warehouses in which to put their goods and to have certificates issued against them, so as to be able to realize money on the manufactured article. I shall probably offer an amendment touching that point. If cotton is to have this privilege, why not grain? Why not, indeed, naval stores, as the Senate has already voted? Why not, indeed, canned salmon, which went on the bill to-day? Why not, indeed, other products of the farm and the sea and the factory and the mill?

I am old-fashioned enough, Mr. President, to believe that this is vicious legislation. If every time an industry in the United States gets into trouble to a greater or less extent the Government is to be asked to get back of it and validate it and make the investment profitable and enable men to get their money out of it, whatever the venture may be in which they are engaged, while I may be wrong about it, I do not see where the end is to be.

Again, Mr. President, I confess I do not see where or when the end of the session is to be. The President gave us some hope of a little respite from the toil and torridity of this Chamber. He did not tell us when, in his judgment, the time would arrive, but it was to arrive at the end of the consideration of three important administration measures, no one of which in its entirety commended itself to me, but yet I was ready to cooperate and to have them voted on. If, however, those measures are to be halted and all conceivable kinds of bills are to be thrust in here on the plea that there is an emergency existing somewhere, and we are to be kept here debating them day in and day out, when is the end to come? I say this very modestly, because I have only 1 vote out of 49—that is about the most we can muster here now—and my vote will not count for very much if the 48 are against me, but I am serious about this matter; I am troubled about it, and I hope that if this bill does go through it will at least be the last emergency bill, unless there is a real emergency, we will be asked to vote upon.

I apprehend that the emergency scheme that the Government should buy ships from a belligerent nation and engage in commerce on the seas is about exploded, and if it is not exploded I am going to take considerable time to discuss it when it is before the Senate; but that has been held up to the country as an emergency measure, and it has been said that we must do extraordinary things and risk trouble on the ocean with contending nations because of the fact that European countries are at war.

Coming down to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], and not particularly addressing myself to the amendment that is now pending, because I know very little about it, I can not see why, if cotton is to have advantages by special legislation, the grain of the great West should not have equal advantage. I assume that the exportation of wheat and other agricultural commodities is halted to some extent—perhaps not to the same extent that is true of cotton, but to some extent—and I know of no reason why they should not be protected to the extent that trade is interrupted.

Mr. President, I want to see this session get along; I should like very much to be able, looking into the future, to see the end come in about two weeks from the present time, because I am willing to sacrifice myself and be a martyr that length of time in addition to what I have already endured, but I am afraid it will not come if the great measures which the President told us must be acted upon, and that no suggestion would be entertained of an adjournment of this session until they were acted upon, are delayed indefinitely by other matters. If they are to be held up for the consideration of measures of all kinds, labeled "emergency measures," then, Mr. President, I am fearful that I will have to wend my way to my home and leave Congress still in session, with possibly less than a quorum, and being forced to adjourn because of the fact that a sufficient number of votes can not be mustered to do business.

It was a very deplorable spectacle this morning that a few of us, gathering here in answer to the command of the Senate given on Saturday last that we should meet at 11 o'clock, had to waste an hour of time in getting 49 out of the 96 Senators to answer to their names. If that is to continue—and we all know that it will grow worse instead of better—we will not only be wasting our time here, but we will be wasting our energies and lowering our vitality for the purpose of passing legislation by a bare quorum of the Senate while Senators better able to remain here than some of the rest of us are enjoying themselves somewhere else.

Mr. President, I shall not oppose the amendment just offered by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] because, as I have said, I know very little about this matter of inspection, and when the amendment submitted by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] is again submitted to the Senate I certainly shall vote for it, and later on I propose to offer an amendment looking to the protection of the manufacturing interests of the section of the country which I in part represent.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall not reply to the general remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire. I have no doubt the conference with the President to which he refers took place before the war in Europe began, and it had reference to the condition of legislation as it then presented itself.

With reference to the amendment I have just offered, I hope it will be adopted, because if it is it will simply carry out in plain language what I conceive to be the spirit and purpose of this bill. I do not think the bill was intended to interfere with State systems of inspection. I do not think it would interfere with them, but it would seem to be most desirable to make it clear and thereby relieve the bill from the opposition of Senators who fear that it might interfere with State inspection.

Again, we have adopted an amendment which limits the operation of this bill at most to a duration of two years. I think it would be most unfortunate to interfere with any State system of inspection by a bill that itself is not to last longer than two years. So it would seem that for every reason it is wise to adopt this brief amendment, which carries out the construction of the bill already entertained by the Senator from North Dakota, and will relieve us from further strife if we adopt it. We will then, I hope, be able to adopt without opposition the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the observations I made would lose much of their potency if I did not make the point of no quorum, so that we might have at least one-half of the Senate present to consider this important measure. I make that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KERN in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	McCumber	Sheppard
Brady	Gore	Martin, Va.	Shields
Bristow	Gronna	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Burton	Hollis	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Camden	Hughes	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Johnson	Overman	Smoot
Chilton	Jones	Perkins	Sterling
Culberson	Kenyon	Pittman	Thomas
Cummins	Kern	Poindexter	Thompson
Dillingham	Lane	Pomerene	Thornton
Fall	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Walsh
Fletcher	Lee, Md.	Shafroth	White

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] has been compelled to leave the Senate on account of sickness. He is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the amendment be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as section 18 the following:

SEC. 18. That none of the provisions of this act shall interfere with any system of inspection provided for in any State.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I certainly can see no objection whatever to that amendment. While I shall not vote for it upon general principles, because I am against all kinds of State inspection, and desire Federal inspection, we could not abolish State inspection if we wanted to. The Government would have no authority whatever to prevent any State inspecting any grain within its borders, or any cotton within its borders, and the bill which I introduced, and which was defeated here by the Senate some time ago, did not in any way, shape, or manner attempt to interfere with State inspection. The only danger to State inspection that would result from the passage of that bill would be that it would give us such a reliable system of inspection that the States probably would not continue their inspection very long, because no one would demand it when they could get a better system.

So while, as I say, I will not vote for this amendment, I am perfectly willing to admit that the amendment can certainly do no harm, because we can not prevent State inspection anyway.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask that my amendment may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from North Dakota reintroduces an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The junior Senator from North Dakota introduces the following amendment:

Add, as a new section, the following:

SEC. 17. That all the provisions of this act are hereby extended to include elevators and warehouses for the storage of grain and flaxseed, together with inspection, classification, and issuance of receipts and certificates, to the same extent, so far as applicable, as the same are specifically made applicable to warehouses for the storage and classification of cotton, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the junior Senator from North Dakota.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the senior Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The senior Senator from North Dakota offers the following amendment, to follow the amendment just agreed to:

That all the provisions of this act shall apply, as far as practicable, to warehouses for, and inspection of, wheat, oats, barley, corn flaxseed, and rye, and the further sum of $50,000, or so much thereof——

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the amendment that was offered by my colleague was substantially the same as that, with the exception of the provision relating to an appropriation of $50,000. Therefore I withdraw my amendment, with the exception of the portion which relates to the appropriation. If the Secretary will just read that, I will move it, not as an amendment to the amendment of my colleague, which has been adopted, but as an addition to follow the amendment just adopted by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just agreed to, it is proposed to add a new paragraph, to read as follows:

And the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be required, is hereby appropriated to pay salaries and expenses relative to grain warehouses for and inspecting of the said grain.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that that does not take care of flaxseed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Flaxseed is inserted there, if the Secretary read it correctly.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask to have the amendment again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

That all the provisions of this act——

Mr. SMOOT. I do not mean that; I mean the last amendment offered by the senior Senator from North Dakota, referring to the appropriation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will ask to insert the word "flaxseed." It is regarded as a grain in the market, and it is really not necessary for that reason.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not regarded as a grain under the law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator wants the $50,000 to cover both grain and flaxseed, it should be so stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The word "flaxseed" is in the amendment offered by the junior Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; the word "flaxseed" appears in the amendment offered by my colleague, so I do not think it is necessary here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the senior Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. CHILTON. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. CHILTON. Do I understand that the amendment including grain has been adopted?

Mr. McCUMBER. It has been adopted; and as $50,000 was regarded as necessary for cotton, it seems hardly just to cut that in two and give only about $25,000 for cotton. Therefore, as we have adopted an amendment making it cover grain, flaxseed, and so forth, it seems quite proper that we should increase the appropriation another $50,000 to cover that.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, there is an amendment I desire to offer to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota; and I should like very much to have him move to reconsider that vote, so that I can offer the amendment.

The situation is simply this: I am very much in favor of this kind of legislation, but I was not here when the amendment was adopted, and I desire to bring the situation in West Virginia to the attention of the Senate. The States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, and West Virginia are largely interested in the production of petroleum oil. The situation in those States at this time is really pitiable. A market has been built up for the sale of petroleum, and it must be transported by pipe line. Whether that be conducted by a trust or not makes no difference here, and I make no charges one way or the other; but the fact remains that the people who produce oil in those States have learned to rely upon the pipe lines as the transportation agency to deliver the oil to the market. As a matter of fact, the oil is turned in from the oil wells to the pipe line and it is sold in the pipe line upon certificates.

Oil has been selling for about a year for $2.50 a barrel. I do not speak accurately; perhaps I should say for several months; but within the last 30 or 60 days the price of that oil has dropped from $2.50 to $1.50 a barrel, and within the last 10 days the pipe lines and the purchasers of oil have notified the oil companies and the oil producers that they will purchase no more oil whatever. Now, that does not mean that it will affect a few people. It means that it will affect thousands and tens of thousands. In my State there are over 20 counties where this is one of the chief products. Banks rely upon the little stipend that comes to the farmer and comes to the oil producer to keep their bank deposits in proper shape. The oil drillers rely upon this business. The timber people rely upon the building of the rigs, and the pipe business depends upon it. In fact, the whole business of a great section of my State, covering 20 or 25 counties, relies largely upon the production of oil.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from West Virginia yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CHILTON. With pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. I think the only way to reach the evil of which the Senator complains is to restore section 3 in the trade commission bill. That was a section that exactly fitted the case in hand. As I understand, the Senator's aim is to compel the Standard Oil Co. to acquire more oil.

Mr. CHILTON. No, sir; not at all. That is not the idea at all. That would not do it; and that section never would accomplish anything for anybody, for the reason that coal, oil, and the different products of mines which it was intended to relieve never have more than a day's product, or at most two or three days' product, on hand, and you can not compel a man to sell his future product. As a matter of fact, when you speak of coal and oil, he never has any product on hand when a man comes to purchase. There was nothing in that amendment that would ever relieve any situation; and it was stricken out by the Senate committee partly for the reason that it was probably ill-advised legislation in principle, but mainly for the reason that in its practical workings it could not bring any benefit to the people it was intended to relieve.

Mr. President, so serious has the situation become in the States of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Kentucky, in these great regions which produce the white-sand oil, the finest grade of oil there is, that public meetings have been called, and the whole business of those sections has been paralyzed. The emergency is probably larger in extent and more severe and far-reaching in its consequences than in the case of any of the other products which have been mentioned.

I want an amendment put on the bill that will reach that situation. Then, Mr. President, there is another situation in my State that ought to be reached. One of the greatest crops in this country is the apple crop of Virginia and West Virginia. The Senators smile, as they did the other day when the Senator from New Jersey mentioned applejack. We do not make any applejack. I live in a dry State. It is dry by 93,000 majority out of a vote of 270,000, and we are enforcing the law. But, Mr. President, the apple crop of West Virginia and Virginia is sold principally in Europe, and it is sold along in the fall of the year. Along about September and October is the time when the apple buyers come in there, and it is an immense product. There are no buyers at all for that product now. These countries are at war. There is no chance for us to sell that product; and if the growers could store their apples in warehouses in some way, it might bring relief to them.

Therefore, without going further into the matter, except to say to the Senate that this is a most serious situation—just as serious to my people and to the States named as could possibly be the cotton situation or the tobacco situation or the canned-salmon situation or the grain situation—I want to offer an amendment providing that the storage of oil and the warehousing of apples may be included in the amendment; and I will ask the Senator whether he would object to my moving to reconsider the vote whereby his amendment was adopted, for that purpose alone?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that is not at all necessary, because it is a different subject matter, the same as grain is a different subject matter from cotton. All the Senator has to do is simply to make his motion to add another provision, which he can formulate in the same way. I would not want to jeopardize the other amendment, which, as I counted the yeas and nays, was carried by only one vote.

Mr. CHILTON. The Senator understands that I voted for his provision, and I did not want to move to reconsider without his permission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be still open to amendment after this amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. CHILTON. I will endeavor to prepare an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the senior Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator. Would it not be better simply to raise the amount provided in the bill to $100,000, and let that amount be used for carrying out the provisions of the act? The bill, in reference to the $50,000, reads as follows:

That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, available until expended, for the expenses of carrying into effect the provisions of this act

Mr. McCUMBER. If that is the way it reads, I think it is better to make it $100,000, instead of adding another provision. I was laboring under the idea, not having the bill before me, that that related simply to cotton.

Mr. JONES. It is a general provision. I simply make the suggestion to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. If it is a general provision, I will, then, withdraw the other amendment I offered, and in lieu of it move to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$100,000."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall be glad to accept the amendment, so far as I am authorized to speak for the committee.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from North Dakota that while he is amending the bill by appropriating additional money to carry out its provisions he ought to endeavor to make the amount sufficient to really put the bill into operation. With naval stores, tobacco, cotton, wool—which, I believe, is to be added to the bill—grain, manufactured goods, canned salmon, and other products, the slightest examination of the powers which are to be given the Secretary of Agriculture will indicate that if the bill is put into operation it will cost a million dollars rather than $100,000. Therefore I suggest to the Senator that he increase his amendment to an amount sufficient to really put the bill into operation. I am an economist, and I do not wish to spend the money, so I will not offer an amendment to the amendment, but I hope the Senator will do so.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say that I am satisfied with the $100,000 at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has been accepted, as the Chair understands. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from West Virginia is preparing an amendment.

Mr. CHILTON. Yes; I am.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have been meditating a little on this bill. I am rather too tired to meditate much, but I have been meditating a little. I have been wondering where the Senators from the State of Washington are.

Mr. JONES. Here is one of them.

Mr. GALLINGER. There is a lot of beautiful lumber up on Puget Sound that the Senator from Washington told us the other day they can not get shipped to market. Do they not want the Government to get back of it and issue certificates on it?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. BORAH. I have not thought much about lumber, but I should be glad to have the Senator use his influence to get wool in.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will vote for wool, of course. I am going to vote for every proper amendment that is proposed, because I think this ought to be an omnibus bill. It is getting to be that now, very rapidly; and I confess this lumber matter troubles me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I want to suggest that both Senators from Washington are here, and that it is not too late yet to include lumber. I suggested the other day that we should have lumber.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why not?

Mr. JONES. One provision of the amendment referred to by the Senator from West Virginia was with regard to apples. That affects us, too.

Mr. GALLINGER. That affects my little State—the apple provision. Why not include apples?

Mr. JONES. Ours, too.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Now, your friend from New Jersey has something to say about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the junior Senator from Washington?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Washington, because I know he has overlooked a very important matter which affects his own State; and as he will be a candidate for reelection later on, he does not want to omit it, of course.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is quite a long way off yet, Mr. President, and many events may occur in the meantime. There are so many products of the State of Washington, such a great variety of them, that I am sure the Senator from New Hampshire, who is so friendly toward the West always——

Mr. GALLINGER. Always.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Will forgive us for not including in this bill everything that we produce. We have been fortunate enough already to have two of our great products included, one of which is salmon. I noticed, by the way—and I was very much surprised to notice it—that some Senators who voted here the other day against Government storage of silver voted with great alacrity in favor of Government storage of salmon; but, of course, I have no objection. It was merely a curious observation. We also have grain included in the bill now, and we are soon to have an opportunity to vote upon apples; and while the Senator is calling attention to the products of Washington and the Senators from Washington—in view of the fact that we have gotten salmon into the bill—I am very much surprised that the Senator has not gotten codfish in. It is one of the great New England products.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will leave that to the Senators from Massachusetts. The sacred codfish is under their special care.

Mr. OVERMAN. Irish potatoes ought to be in, too. Do not the Senators think so?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I might suggest, also, that one of the favorite New England commodities is beans.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. President, my meditations led me a little beyond the lumber of Puget Sound, but I really am somewhat distressed about that omission, and I hope it will be provided against. The Senators from California are not here, but it is a well-known fact that when you ask a bright young California girl what they do with all their fruit, she says: "We eat what we can, and we can what we can't." I do not see why the California Senators are not getting in their canned fruits; they are exported, and the Government ought to protect them. They can not send them abroad now, and they will spoil. They may have lead poisoning as a result of keeping them in cans too long, and this ought not to be permitted.

Then there is Heinz's 57 varieties. What are you going to do with that important industry of the United States? Are you going to have it stopped because the European Governments are at war? Why not let Heinz build some great warehouses and fill them up with his catsup and his piccalilli and his other toothsome preparations and have the Government issue certificates against them until the war blows over and normal conditions return, and have the certificates in the meantime to purchase labor and tinware and all that sort of thing, and go along successfully?

I am glad that apples have been mentioned, because we raise a good many apples in New England, and we are improving our varieties and our output. We send them mostly to Europe, but they will not go there this year, and I am afraid we can not warehouse them and keep them many years, yet I think we ought at least to have the privilege of doing it during the life of this bill, which is to be two years at most.

But more serious than all that to a New England man is the fact that our textile manufacturers are straining every nerve to keep their help employed. One concern in my own State, employing 15,000 people, is hanging on by the finger tips, hoping that conditions will improve, determined to continue the employment of their working men and working women. There is danger that after a while they will have a surplus of their products, and they ought to have the privilege of warehousing them and having certificates issued against them, and getting money so that they may get along as well at least as the cotton men of the South.

There is a still further great industry of New England. I noticed somewhere that the feet of the soldiers of the German army are clad in such wretched boots that they are hampered in their operations on the battlefield. We can not get the splendid shoes that we make in New England into Germany now or into France or into England, but we are making them.

Our great factories are at work. They are having a hard time of it just now, and we would like very much to have the benefit of this bill. I may offer an amendment on that point, and, of course, I expect it will be agreed to, because everything else is being agreed to.

We would like very much to have the Government get back of our shoe shops and take care of the products of our shoe factories for the term of a couple of years and issue certificates against the boots and shoes that we make—the finest in the world—so that when the war is over the poor soldiers who survive may be supplied with New Hampshire boots and shoes.

Mr. President, I am more serious about this matter than perhaps I appear to be. I do not believe in this kind of legislation at all. As I said a moment ago, I think it is vicious in its tendencies. Everything is going to be brought in here during the course of the next few weeks on the ground that it is an emergency measure, because the armies of Europe are slaughtering each other by the hundreds of thousands in the most wicked war which the world has ever known or perhaps ever will know, and we are casting an anchor to windward to make money for our own people. Perhaps it is legitimate, but I do not think the Government ought to be dragged into this matter of taking care of the industries of any part of the country.

As suggested by the Senator from Washington, if the salmon of the waters in Washington, which produce, I believe, the finest salmon in the world, except those produced in Maine, are to be cared for, why should not the codfish of the New England waters be taken care of? I believe, however, that under our bad legislation Canada is getting most of them now, but those that are left to us ought to be looked after. If the Senators from Massachusetts neglect to offer an amendment taking care of the fish that has its effigy over the speaker's desk in the statehouse at Boston, they will be neglecting an opportunity that I think they will regret.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In this connection I call the Senator's attention to a circumstance in order to refresh his memory. He has no doubt noticed it already. The great French fishing fleet on the Newfoundland Banks has been called home as a part of the army reserve. So there will be a greater supply of codfish on account of the war than there has been heretofore.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very glad to know that. It is important.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GALLINGER. I always yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish to know if the money issued upon a certificate of storage of codfish would not be tainted.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not see why more tainted than other issues from this administration.

Mr. President, I am more serious than I pretend to be. I may, at the proper time, offer the amendment I have suggested, that textile manufactures and boots and shoes shall be included in this long list of specialties that we are dealing in to-day, and that will help to put this omnibus bill in a better shape than it is.

Mr. CHILTON. I was going to ask the Senator, before he did that, to let me have a vote upon my amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. If it is oil, whether it is Standard oil or any other kind, if there is an emergency——

Mr. CHILTON. No doubt there is.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Before the Senator presses that to a vote, will he permit me a word or two?

Mr. CHILTON. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I feel very sadly over this matter. I felt that I had a monopoly as to apples, and that was largely my prerogative, but here I find the distinguished Senator from West Virginia and then the Senator from New Hampshire both put in a claim. I am the original and real genuine apple man, and I think it is very ungenerous that you should interfere with our apple industry and the products that come from our apples.

Mr. GALLINGER. Evidently the Senator forgets Adam.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. But I have even seen that story questioned.

Mr. CHILTON. I never heard the Senator make that claim for the apple. I heard him make the claim about applejack.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Occasionally we eat apples, but every sensible man knows that the best of applejack is made from good apples. I feel that the gentlemen are trenching on my prerogative and my privilege. I do not think tar from North Carolina and various other products are in the same category or in the same class with salmon. My friend from Oregon [Mr. LANE] pressed salmon and I voted for salmon. I felt there was just as much reason for that as for other things that were being pressed by my friend from Georgia. Of course salmon is good food, and as I said is in an entirely different class, as I understand. Fish are rich in phosphorus and supply the brain. If I believed one-tenth part or one-hundredth part of what our Republicans have been telling me for the last 25 or 30 years, God knows we need brains, for the Republican party arrogates to itself all the brains. They said they had all the brains and hence we are in a miserable dilemma just now with a great demand for brains and all the problems arising from the war on our hands and all the questions confronting our administration. I know they never would say anything they did not believe for they are not that kind.

I feel that salmon is all right, and I favored salmon. I would like to add some things: Speer's Grape Juice, The Rising Sun, and Hinchcliffe's Beer. These are all products of the little State of New Jersey, and it does seem to me utterly cruel to leave them out.

Just now the question of salmon brings to my mind the question that was asked here Saturday, I think, by the distinguished Senator from Iowa. He asked the Senator from Oregon how he would know the grade of salmon in order to properly classify it. If the Senator had thought for a moment, with just one of the five senses that God has left us with you can easily detect whether salmon is first class or last class, or of no class at all.

This reminds me of a fish story that I must tell. It may be a little undignified, but we have heard nothing but fish for two or three days. Let me say I am in favor, now that the price of beef is going up, of making more than one fish day. Friday is not enough. Let us have two fish days each week, at least, and change the calendar so that we may have two Fridays on which to eat fish.

Now, let me tell the story: A man who lived on the coast of New Jersey had made a very great success as a fisherman. He used to go out and breast the tide and come back with his bark full of fish, and he would sell them. Finally, as years grew on him and he was burdened with age, more or less, and crippled, he could not row and pull the oar as he did. So he opened a nice little shop in a thrifty little town near the coast. He painted it up nicely and made it very respectable, and put up a glorious sign, "Fresh fish for sale here." Trade was slow. Finally he appealed to a friend in whom he had great confidence. He said, "Look at my stuff." The friend was a kind of an oracle to him. He said, "Come out and look at the front." He walked out into the middle of the street. He said, "Look at my sign." He had a 16-foot board with elegant, gilded letters, "Fresh fish for sale here." He asked, "What do you think of that?" His friend looked at him and said, "Joe, I hate to criticize, but you have too much in it." He asked, "How would you correct it?" "If I were you, I would just paint out 'fresh.' Fish is really the thing, anyway. You are not selling stale fish." So he crossed out "fresh." Then he came back the next day and fish were not selling any better, and he said, "What do you think of it now?" Said he, "I would cut out those words 'for sale.' Everybody knows you are selling fish. You do not give them away." He crossed those words out and it stood "Fish here." Finally, when he came to the last, he said to his friend, with a good deal of misgiving, "Now, what do you think of it?" "Lord, Joe," he said, "you have too much of those letters. I would cross out the word 'here.'" "What do you mean? I mean business. I am selling fish, and here is where I sell them, and how in the name of heaven will they know?" He said, "Everybody could tell that from the smell." [Laughter.] So I think my friend will be able to gauge salmon in the same way.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, in the days of old Rameses that story had paresis.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The Senator ought to know, for he comes from a fish town.

Mr. WEEKS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section:

SEC. —. That all the provisions hereof are extended to include warehouses for the storage of apples and peaches, and for tanks, tankage, and pipe lines for the storage of oil, together with the inspection, classification, and the issuance of receipts and certificates therefor to the same extent, so far as applicable, as the same are made applicable to warehouses for the storage and classification of cotton under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, with a good deal of care and labor a Representative from the House and I, together with the Secretary of Agriculture and experts from that department, prepared this bill. The bill, I believed when we prepared it, and believe now, has great merit.

I confess that it has been with more than ordinary pain that I have heard Senators present amendments intended to be trivial and make speeches intended to be humorous. All we ask from the Government is an appropriation of $50,000. That is the entire burden put upon the Government by this bill. Mr. President, there are 12 States which produce practically but one moneyed crop. The industries of those States depend largely upon the annual sale in the fall of that crop. The great bulk of the population—certainly those engaged in agriculture—depend upon that crop. Among them there are 2,000,000 negroes, who do not know how to do much else but to raise cotton.

That crop last year sold for a billion dollars. The portion of it which went abroad in the shape of lint cotton sold for $610,000,000, and saved our international trade balance. This large sum took care of our international balance and gave vigor and power to the entire commerce of the United States. But for the war in Europe the crop would be worth now a billion dollars.

Mr. President, is it entirely worthy of Senators when such a subject is presented to seek to treat it in a ludicrous manner? I confess that it has not been amusing to me, because I know it is a serious problem. The men who raise this crop work 8 months in the year to produce it, and then sell, according to the custom, in 60 days. They borrow nearly $500,000,000 in connection with the production of the crop, and 12 States rely upon this crop going upon the market at this period of the year to make the settlements for their liabilities built up during the year.

Now, what has happened? The greatest calamity that has come to these people in 40 years has been brought about in three weeks by the foreign war. You can not eat cotton. It is worthless to the man who produces it except to sell it. It is not like nearly all other agricultural products. It is not like foodstuffs. It is a remarkable crop in that you can store it for years and it is uninjured. It is not consumed by any animal after it is gathered. It is not injured by moths. It has a quality suited to storage and suited to continued preservation unequalled by any other agricultural product. Now, what has happened? Instead of being able to sell their 13,000,000 bales of cotton in the latter part of August, in September, October, and November, when their liabilities are maturing, they bring their cotton to the market and there is no market. Why? Two-thirds of this crop goes abroad. In Germany, in Belgium, in France, in England the mills consume it annually. War has closed them, and cotton, which to-day would be selling at 13 cents a pound, is practically without a market, and $500,000,000 of debt rests on the men who have produced the crop and stares them in the face and threatens them with ruin.

I say, Mr. President, I can not find language with which to praise a Senator who takes the floor to treat such a measure in a trivial manner. I consider that the course of Senators must have been due to thoughtlessness and the lack of appreciation of real conditions.

Now, what do we ask in this bill? There is no system through the South of universal or general classification of cotton. There has been no system of warehousing throughout the South. It has not been necessary. Never before in the history of this crop have those who produced it been confronted with over 8,000,000 bales of cotton, with no American market for it, and no mills that probably can spin for months.

All we ask is an appropriation of $50,000 from the Government to allow the Department of Agriculture, through its market division, through experts that it already has, the balance of the expense going as a charge to the people benefited, to inaugurate a system of cotton warehouses. Those men who have warehouses they desired licensed by the Secretary of Agriculture will receive from the Secretary a license and then be subject to the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture, which, when complied with, would carry to the world a knowledge of the kind of cotton deposited and kind of warehousing used. This would give a value to the warehouse receipts which otherwise they would not have. That is all we ask.

The Senator from New Hampshire talks about taking care of New England. Mr. President, we have been buying protected products of New England for half a century, and the Government has taken care of New England. It has added to the price of the manufactured product by protecting it from foreign competition.

I shall not discuss that proposition now. I do not intend to be provoked into a debate upon that with the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But I do wish to say I expected the modest request we make to appeal to the generous disposition of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no disposition to debate it with the Senator either. I did not raise the question. The Senator might well add that the mills of New England are doing something to take care of the cotton from the South.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; the New England mills are buying and using some of the cotton, and the cotton is taking care of the mills of New England. If we did not raise the cotton they would never have erected their mills or made their fortunes out of cotton. I am glad they have made them. I have no criticism upon that, and I am not complaining about the past system of taxation which enabled them to prosper. I desire to see them prosper.

But I submit to the Senator that the modest request of this bill has not been treated with the generosity that I think we had a right to expect. I do not believe that the speeches some of the Senators have made or the course some of the Senators have taken would have been pursued if they had really understood the situation.

I do not think any amendment ought to have been added to this bill. I think it ought to have been allowed to go through as it was, applicable to cotton alone. I wish to say to the Senator from Iowa that I offered an amendment providing that this act should not remain in force longer than nine months after the conclusion of a treaty of peace between Great Britain and Germany, and in no event longer than two years. It came as a suggestion from the Senator from Iowa in his remarks made last Saturday. So make this bill a temporary measure, and the entire sum that we ask or wish from the National Government is $50,000 that we may better classify our product when put in our own warehouses.

Mr. President, a large part of this money owed for raising the cotton crop is due outside the South. The merchants of New York, of Boston, and the Middle West hold much of the indebtedness. The foodstuffs used to make it were bought from the Middle West. The manufactured products were bought from the East and the West. The object of this bill is to furnish a more systematic plan of classifying cotton in warehouses and classifying the warehouses; that is all. The bulk of the expense must be carried by the people who receive the benefit. The plan of the bill looked toward the principal work of inspection being made by licensed inspectors, who obtain their fees not from the Government for doing the work but from the warehouse owners. Only a general supervision was left to the National Government. Yet when this small request is made on behalf of the people of 12 States, whose great product, upon which they absolutely depend, has been stricken down by a foreign war, Senators come in facetiously and load the bill down with amendments that do not in any sense stand in the same class with cotton and make it ludicrous. Is this generous, I wish to ask?

If Senators wish to kill the bill, let them vote to kill it. If they are not willing to concede this much to a people who are suffering as those people are suffering, let them vote against the bill. I do not deny their right to do so, but I do, Mr. President, enter my earnest request that they treat the subject seriously.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, I can add nothing to what the Senator from Georgia has said in his appeal to the broader view—the patriotic view—on this subject, but I want Senators for a moment to consider this matter from a selfish standpoint.

I ask them if they think it will benefit the Nation to see the South in bankruptcy? That is what it means. Unless this situation is taken care of the South will be in bankruptcy. Her people will be in want. I appeal to Senators and ask them if they think they will advance the general welfare by defeating this bill—by denying the South the relief this legislation will afford? Do you think for a moment, when the people of the South are impoverished and stricken down, it will advance the sale of your manufactured goods?

If the cotton of the South is not taken care of in this emergency, many of the negroes and the poorer white people of the South will have to go barefooted during the coming winter. Will that help your shoe market? If the South is stricken down for the want of the enactment of this legislation, her poor must go half clad through the winter. Will that help the New England mills? Consider that.

Now, I appeal to Senators from the West. You want a market for your grain, for your flour, for your meat. Do you expect to find it in the South, with the South lying stricken and prostrate in bankruptcy? Remember that we are your greatest customer; we are the customer at your very doors. You do not need to ship your grain and meat and flour across the sea in order to place these great products in our hands. We want them; we need them; but, Mr. President, in order that we may buy them we must have legislation to aid us in the present crisis to prevent bankruptcy in the South. I will appeal to the Senator from West Virginia and admonish him that the ore and apples of his State will find a market in the South if we have the money with which to purchase them; his coal will find a place for sale there; but the market for these products depends upon the question of whether we can save the South in this hour of her peril and her need.

Cotton is a great national crop, different from any other crop that is raised in the world. It stands alone; it can be treated and should be treated by itself, apart from all other agricultural productions. Its injury or destruction affects the prosperity of the entire Nation. No agricultural production sustains such intimate relation to all other interests of the country as it does. I again appeal to Senators, on selfish grounds, to help us in this hour of our need.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I confess I was more than surprised to hear the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] lecture the Senate, and especially those of us who from the start have shown so much interest in his plan for the relief of his section of the country. I have never uttered, except in the greatest candor and seriousness, a word upon this subject. I made no fun of his bill; I made no fun of the amendment of any Senator. I am in good faith in sympathy with the Senator's bill. I appreciate that it is something that is needed in the southern section of the country, and if I had not known the facts I would have taken the statements made by the Senators from that section as conveying the truth and as portraying absolutely the situation. It is very strange when we treat those Senators in that way that the Senator from Georgia is not willing, as are other Senators, who are serving here with the same desire to do right and under the same conscientious regard for their duties as Senators, to take my word about the situation in my State as we take their word about the situation in the South. It is strange that the Senator should make an address in the Senate and lecture me because of an amendment which I choose to offer to a pending measure—a bill for which I intend to vote, a bill for which I shall vote if my amendment is not put on it, a bill about which I will help him in any way, and stay here night or day to help him pass, whether he agrees with me as to the wisdom of my amendment or not—I say it is very strange that the Senator should lecture me about that, and in doing so make the statement that the situation as to oil is different from that of cotton.

It simply shows that the Senator from Georgia has not gone to the trouble of studying the oil question, as I have gone to the trouble of studying the cotton question. He does not know that there is not a dollar's worth of oil sold as oil in a barrel or in bulk; it is sold by certificate, and the storage device is a tank or a pipe line.

In considering the purposes of this bill, can anybody tell me the distinction between oil and cotton? Oil does not deteriorate much; and if it should, there is an easy way to estimate the amount of its deterioration. Oil is turned into a pipe line or into a tank, and you sell it on the certificate from the common carrier. Wherein, therefore, does the Senator's situation differ from mine? How shall he complain of me when it is raining and I shall say, "Stretch the umbrella just a little over on my side"?

Mr. President, I do not know whether or not the oil people of West Virginia will take advantage of this privilege if it shall be extended to them by Congress; I have not had time to consult with them. I noted, however, that the Senator from Georgia, without objection, allowed amendments to be adopted, including flaxseed, corn, wheat, oats, barley, and all such products. He did not accuse the Senator presenting that amendment of lack of seriousness in presenting that situation to the Senate. Certainly the oil situation more nearly resembles the cotton situation than does the situation of flaxseed, corn, wheat, and other grains.

Mr. President, talking a little more to the point, I wish to say to the Senator that if he desires this matter to rest upon his statement, all right; I can stand for it. I want to repeat to him, however, that I am for his bill; I am for it because I think it is right; I am for it because I recognize a necessity for it; but I wish also to say to him that, standing absolutely upon all fours with his situation, except that it is probably worse and affects more people, is the oil situation in the States of West Virginia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Illinois, and Kentucky.

I am as much surprised as is the Senator from Georgia that Senators will rise here and make a comparison between the lumber business and the manufacturing business, of boots and shoes, for instance, and Heinz's pickles, or anything of that kind, as standing upon all fours with the serious situation that affects the farmers and the producers of oil and products of that kind. If a man is a manufacturer of shoes he can get credit upon them; if he has lumber he can get credit upon it in bulk; but in the oil States a farmer has, perhaps, leased out his farm to an oil company which is probably producing 100 barrels of oil a day; the farmer gets one-eighth of it as his return. All he gets for that is a certificate of how much oil he has in a pipe line, which is the only way there is for transporting it. Probably there will be 50 men who will get certificates for the other seven-eighths.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHILTON. Let me finish this statement. That is true as to hundreds and thousands of little leases and of hundreds and thousands of small producers of oil. Now I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from West Virginia what is the cause of the oil crises? Is it superinduced by the war situation in Europe, or is it by reason of an industrial condition in this country?

Mr. CHILTON. It is produced by the conditions growing out of the European war. That is, to a great——

Mr. BORAH. How does that bring it about?

Mr. CHILTON. I will answer the Senator from Idaho in this way—and I answer the Senator the way I do, because that is the information given to me by the pipe-line people as I see it in the public prints: All oil producers understand that what is known as the white-sand oil of the east is almost entirely a foreign shipment oil, and that owing to the fact that European countries are at war and that the transportation facilities have been so interfered with, the pipe lines can not dispose of this oil. There is a limit to the capacity of their tanks, and there is also a limit to the capacity of the pipe lines. That situation probably will not be relieved by this bill, but I can imagine a way in which they could build tanks so that this oil could be stored in such tanks and the certificates would be salable. I do not know that that will be practicable, but there is a possibility that it may be.

Mr. BORAH. Has the price of oil gone down as has the price of cotton, of which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] has spoken?

Mr. CHILTON. The price of oil, as I said to the Senate, began to go down probably 60 days ago. This oil was then selling at $2.50 a barrel, and it has now gone down to $1.50 a barrel. It is stated that the reason for that is the great production of oil in Oklahoma. It is claimed that they have a process now by which the same amount of gasoline can be extracted from the Oklahoma oil as can be extracted from the eastern oil. I doubt this claim, but I want to be fair and do not desire nor is there need to go beyond the facts and the claims of both sides.

Mr. BORAH. I had understood that the oil situation was one arising out of conditions not wholly incident to the unfortunate conditions in Europe; but I want to ask the Senator a question. I sympathize entirely with the situation as presented by the Senator from Georgia with reference to the condition of cotton; I think I see quite a distinction between the situation with reference to the South and the production of cotton and many of the other products which Senators are seeking to fasten upon this bill; but I presume neither the Senator from Georgia nor the Senator from West Virginia is oblivious of the fact that we are establishing a precedent which will be applicable in any industrial crisis or situation which may hereafter arise in this country with reference to any industry.

In the West even now we are unable to get rid of our lumber by reason of conditions which we tried, although, unfortunately, we did not succeed very well, to present to the Senate the other day; it sometimes happens with reference to our wheat and our wool that the market is such that the price will not pay for the shipping of it. There is no difference in that situation and this situation except as to the cause which produces it. The principle, however, which we are establishing here is one which will be of just as much importance after the war in Europe has ceased as it is now. I presume the Senator is not oblivious of that fact?

Mr. CHILTON. I do not agree with the Senator from Idaho in his conclusions. What the Senator says, so far as the States affected are concerned, is no doubt a fact. But the world is now at war. The present situation is one due to war. War excuses almost any expedient.

Mr. BORAH. We are doing a great many things, and perhaps necessarily doing them, by reason of the war situation; but the result of our action and of that which is to flow from our action will be felt in this country long after the war has closed.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I was about to say, when interrupted a moment ago, that I want the Senate to understand that the amendment I have offered affects thousands and ten of thousands of small holders and small producers of oil, and extends over a great area, as I have said, throughout a great part of the States of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and a good part of Kentucky. This is a unique product, one which is affected, if our information is correct, peculiarly by the war conditions. I do not agree with the Senator that we should not do things in time of war that we do not countenance in times of peace; but this situation never before occurred in the history of the world. Most of the civilized world is now at war. The nations at war have been our customers.

Therefore I say we have the foreign trade of the United States absolutely stopped without notice, and any situation growing out of that condition, such as the piling up in this country of a large surplus of goods or commodities ordinarily sold in foreign markets, we as a people should meet, just as we would in times of war meet a lack of currency by issuing greenbacks; or as in time of war we would meet any other emergency. We should be liberal enough and broad enough to devise ways and means to meet that kind of a situation. The President is doing his work nobly. Congress should be eager to provide effective means to lessen the severity of the terrible blow to commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CHILTON. I do.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is it not a fact that the combination controlling the production and refining of oil has much to do with the price of the oil to the small producers, in whom the Senator is justly interested?

Mr. CHILTON. I will say to the Senator that as to that a great many people in West Virginia have the same opinion as has the public generally, to wit, that finally all oil, or practically all of it, goes to one place in the United States. On the other hand, others claim that there really is competition. The latter maintain that there are a lot of independent concerns engaged in the oil business, and that the percentage of oil which goes to the combination has been materially reduced since the decision of the Supreme Court. However, as to that I have no facts; but I want to say for the Standard Oil Co. that in ordinary times it handles the oil expeditiously; it handles it conveniently; and many of the producers are satisfied with it if they are paid a sufficient price. I do not know anything about the inside workings of the Standard; I have no information about it; but I have introduced a resolution here for the purpose of securing the facts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. CHILTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that the delay in foreign shipments has been quite as much due to the question of foreign exchange as it has to shipping facilities. It is true, of course, that during the first few weeks in August there was practical stagnation in shipments. We passed a bill here the other day to purchase silver bullion. The reason we passed it was because the smelter men were loaded down with the products of the smelter. They had been advancing 50 cents an ounce on silver and were shipping the bullion abroad, but the bills which they drew against it came back unpaid, and, therefore, having ten or twelve million dollars invested in that kind of a product, they did not have available resources to continue to advance 50 cents an ounce, and notified the producers that they would only advance 25 cents an ounce for silver. The Senator from West Virginia admits that additional pipe lines and additional containers of oil must be constructed, if his amendment should be adopted.

Mr. CHILTON. No.

Mr. WEEKS. Well, the Senator suggested it; at any rate I will say he suggested it.

Mr. CHILTON. I say that may be the fact; I do not know.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me say to the Senator that, in my judgment, inside of 60 days the price of oil will be as high as it has been in recent times, because the great competitive oil-producing country is Russia, and we will obtain some of the markets of Russia, as well as holding our own.

It is not true that to-day we are not shipping products abroad. We shipped abroad 7,000,000 bushels of grain last week. There are now 18 steamers carrying passengers bound for our Atlantic ports from European ports. The trans-Atlantic trade has been practically restored, so far as most conditions are concerned, and I think the Senator will find that inside of 30 days normal conditions will obtain in the oil industry.

Mr. CHILTON. The bearer of good news is always welcome; I welcome what the Senator has said, and it will be a great consolation to take it back to my people. I feel reasonably sure that the Senator is correct in the main.

As I have said, Mr. President, I do not know that the oil producers will take advantage of the provision which I have proposed as an amendment to this bill, but it is a suggestion which has come to me from some people interested in the oil industry, who have asked that we do something for them in a great emergency.

Bear in mind that the only way a man can produce oil is by pumping it from the ground into a tank and turning it into a pipe line. He can only hold in the tank next to his well two or three hundred barrels, speaking generally. I believe the average tank holds about 250 barrels. The pipe-line people will now only take 25 per cent of it. The result is that the oil wells are likely to be destroyed in a very short while because the paraffin that is in the oil is likely to cake in the interstices in the rock through which the oil comes, and may absolutely destroy the well.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator who owns the main pipe lines?

Mr. CHILTON. I do not know.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Standard Oil Co. own them?

Mr. CHILTON. I understand one of them belongs to the Eureka Pipe Line Co., and that in some sections the pipe lines belong to the Pure Oil Co., of Philadelphia. I understand that is an independent company; but its pipe line does come immediately into my section of the State of West Virginia, although other fields have the benefit of it. In some oil fields—I think, in Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois—they have the benefit of the Eureka pipe lines and also of the Pure Oil Co.'s lines. That is my information. In West Virginia we have only one, which is the one that formerly belonged to the Standard Oil Co., and which the oil people suppose yet belongs to somebody connected with that company.

Mr. BORAH. Is that one of the lines which belonged to the Standard Oil Co. before the dissolution decree?

Mr. CHILTON. Oh, yes.

Mr. BORAH. Does anyone suppose that it does not belong to them yet? Does not the Senator believe from his investigations that, as a matter of fact, it is still under their control?

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I have not investigated the matter, but I believe it is; I believe the same people who own the Standard Oil Co. own the pipe-line company. I believe that, and I think the facts will justify that belief; but I am not prepared to say that it is the same company. What I might prove in a lawsuit and what I might think as a private citizen might be different. I only know that it is claimed that they have dissolved in accordance with the decree of the Supreme Court. I do not think they have actually dissolved in the way in which the people think a dissolution should be accomplished, because there is still the vice of common ownership of stock. But my resolution for an investigation ought to develop the facts, and until the facts are known it does not become me to say that the Supreme Court was wrong. Besides, my people want relief, and do not care to take any roundabout way to get it. This is not the time and place to make charges, but it is the time to help those entitled to help.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CHILTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator has made a very clear explanation of the situation in regard to oil. What I should like to know is the relation between oil and peaches.

Mr. CHILTON. Of course, Mr. President, I can not make as clear a case for peaches and apples as I can for oil, for the reason that the plan of storing oil and issuing certificates thereon has been tried; but it has not been tried as to apples and peaches. I can say, however, that I can make as good a case for peaches and apples as can be made for canned salmon, and I can make as good a case for them as can be made for wheat and corn and anything else of that character.

The great apple and peach crop in my State, Mr. President, is in pretty much the same condition that the oil business is in. The apples and peaches are owned largely by small farmers and their principal market is in Europe. Now they find no buyers, even at this time of the year, and they do not know whether to pack their crop in one kind of a basket for a certain market or put in into barrels for another market or box it for another market. They have been relying upon the European market. The war makes the situation the same with respect to those products as it does with respect to other products.

There is this to be said about my amendment. If we adopt such a provision as I seek to have incorporated in this bill it can not hurt the Government; it can not hurt anybody else; and it might be the means in a great emergency of saving from disaster a lot of people who can not afford to lose their crops. If they can warehouse their crops and have certificates issued against them in the warehouse, these certificates might be used as a basis of credit.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. CHILTON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRISTOW. I do not think that upon reflection the Senator will say that the question of storing peaches in warehouses and issuing certificates as to their value will stand upon the same basis as a similar operation in connection with wheat.

Mr. CHILTON. It stands on the same basis; there is only a difference of degree. Of course, you might not rely upon a peach certificate as you would on a wheat certificate, because the former is more perishable.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator knows that peaches are perishable and that it is not practical to handle them as it is to handle wheat or cotton.

Mr. CHILTON. I know that wheat is perishable, and I know that corn is perishable.

Mr. BRISTOW. The Senator knows that wheat is one of the staples of life, that there is always a market for it at some price, that it can be put on the market any day and command cash, that it does not spoil, that it will last for centuries, and that it is one of the great products of the American people. We export millions of bushels of wheat. I feel a good deal like the Senator from Georgia feels when it comes to asking that peaches, which may not last probably for longer than 10 days, shall be put on the same basis in a bill like this with wheat and cotton and great staples which are exported and bring to the people of the United States their great wealth.

Mr. CHILTON. I knew that before the discussion was over the Senator from Kansas would lecture somebody. I do not mind his lecturing me, if he wants to do so, but I still have the same idea about the matter. He can proceed with his lecture now or at any other time, as he sees fit, but I shall still entertain my own opinion about it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CHILTON. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In view of the fact that we will be called to vote on the proposition of including peaches and apples in this bill, and in view of the further fact that the State which I in part represent is interested in both peaches and apples, I should like to inquire of the Senator from West Virginia what sort of a standard the Government would fix as to peaches and apples in issuing certificates? As to cotton, I think that that commodity stands in a situation different from that of any other product, for various reasons which it is not necessary to discuss here.

Mr. CHILTON. There are about 17 different grades of cotton, are there not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not particularly informed as to that; but I understand that the grading of cotton is a very intricate matter, calling for expert knowledge, and that the bill is very vague as to the basis on which cotton shall be graded. It leaves it, in fact, to the Secretary of Agriculture to establish standards and rules and regulations and to appoint so-called experts, who, under the rules and regulations, shall fix grades of cotton. If the Senators representing the great cotton-producing States are satisfied with that arrangement, I am willing to accept their judgment upon it.

Even though we should include in this bill apples—and apples occupy quite a different situation from that occupied by peaches—and should also include peaches, I would not be willing to leave to the Secretary of Agriculture the matter of grading, of establishing a first grade, a second grade, and a third grade, and of prescribing the kind of boxes in which they shall be packed, or whether they shall be packed in boxes or in barrels.

If the Senator will permit me, I want to say in this connection that there has been quite a controversy before several committees of the House and the Senate in connection with bills which have been pending for several years as to standard apple boxes and as to the grades of apples. One of the objections which the apple growers of the Pacific Northwest have had to some of those bills was, in the first place, that the No. 1 grade as proposed to be established by the law was a No. 3 grade under the standards to which we are accustomed in the Northwest, and an injury would be worked upon us in that regard if any such standard should be established under this bill. If it should be passed, it will be subject to the same objection that our apple growers had to the other bills to which I have referred.

The same objection applies as to the receptacles in which apples are packed. In New York and probably in West Virginia the ordinary receptacle is a barrel. We do not use barrels on the Pacific coast. In Colorado they use a box of a certain size which they have adopted, while on the Pacific coast they use a box of another size. All such matters would be subject to regulation by an unknown authority without any limitation in the statute if these commodities should be included in this bill under the Senator's amendment and would constitute objections to the amendment.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator, as to the peach crop, he probably does not realize that we have one peach orchard in West Virginia where the peaches are loaded right out of the orchard into the cars, the railroad tracks being laid into the orchard. It is an immense orchard, probably one of the largest peach orchards, if not the largest peach orchard, in this country. The peach business is an extensive one.

I do not want to go into the details of grading and inspecting fruit, but there is nothing in the bill which would compel anybody to take a certificate of cotton, and there is nothing in the amendment I have offered requiring anybody to take the Government's certificate of apples and peaches. There is no provision in the bill to prevent forging a certificate or duplicating it. There is simply a way here by which I thought it would be possible to let these people get credit upon an article which may not be salable on account of war. Now, when a man buys a cotton certificate, he knows that he is getting a cotton certificate, and he takes that chance. He knows it with an apple certificate or a wheat certificate or anything else he may get. We know that the oil certificate is absolutely reliable, and that the principal part of the oil business is conducted upon the storage of oil in tanks or in pipe lines, and the sale of it made by certificates of oil in the possession of the common carrier, the pipe lines.

As I say, just as strong a case can be made here for apples and peaches as can be made for some of these other things. I want to say again that I resent the insinuation or the charge that I am trifling with the Senate. I want to reiterate my statement that I am heartily in favor of the bill offered by the Senator from Georgia, and I want to relieve the cotton people. I am surprised that he does not feel the same generous spirit toward West Virginia that she feels toward the South. I wish the Senator could go with me to the apple and peach orchards of West Virginia and see there the intelligent, painstaking horticulturists demonstrating that the home of the apple and the peach is in West Virginia. It takes years to bring in an orchard. During these long tedious years the producer must make large expenditures for fertilizers and disinfectants. There is no return till the tree matures and bears, but the work on the young orchard must be done every year. It is now about the time of year when the fruit buyers come to my State, but owing to the fact that so much of our fruit, and especially that produced in the eastern Panhandle, is shipped to Europe, our orchard people fear that this war will fall heavily upon them. My plan may be impractical. No apple or peach raiser has asked me to do this. But I can see no reason why the opportunity to store apples and peaches and issue certificates thereon should shock anyone who has voted to do the same thing for flax, oats, wheat, and other grain.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that I can see a great deal of force in the Senator's argument as far as oil is concerned, but I can not vote for his amendment if it includes peaches and apples, because I believe it is utterly impracticable. If he will cut out the peaches and apples and will stand on the oil, I should be disposed to support his amendment.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I wish here and now to disavow any part of unkindness or ungenerous sentiment toward the people of the South or toward my friend the distinguished Senator from Georgia. I realize that I, perhaps more or as much as anyone else, was the one to whom the shafts of his eloquence were directed. I did make some jest and possibly apology for satire on the bill proposed by the Senator.

So far as desiring to aid the South is concerned, great God! there is no man in this universe who feels more kindly, more sympathetic, and more generous toward the South than do I. Some of my brightest and happiest days were spent in the sunny South. I was a leaner to your cause. I say to you men of the South—the glorious, beautiful, sunny South—I love it. I love the stalwart men; I love the generous hearts and the impulses that prompt your action; I love and admire, as a man can, your glorious and beautiful women. I say to you, far be it from me to say unjust or unpleasant things of the South. I was not contending against the people of the South, but I was contending against a policy which I think dangerous and disastrous.

That is all there was in my jest or ridicule; and, after all, I do not think it is susceptible to such severe criticism when I suggest a product that is a benefit to mankind, in contrast to your tobacco, which was put in the bill with no particular objection from the distinguished Senator. But if this thing can be carried out this far, why may it not be carried farther? Why may it not, as I say, extend to corn and wheat? As a Senator from New Jersey, whose life since early boyhood, until the past few years, has been that of a farmer, why should not I stand and press on the protection of my products with the same earnestness that the Senator from Georgia presses his tobacco or his cotton?

I was only questioning your policy. I feel that my heart is as big and as generous and as prompt in kindly impulses toward my fellow men as that of any other man in this Chamber or elsewhere; but why may not I adopt the same course?

We are rich in other things beyond those of which I spoke. We have a clay marvelous in character, clay that is shipped abroad to enter into the china and pottery ware of the world. Trenton, Woodbridge, and other parts of my State are manufacturing pottery from that clay. We, with you, are stifled to-day. Our workmen are idle. They say it is because of the war and the fact that they can not ship their product. I have received letters and telegrams from men saying:

> In heaven's name, what shall we do? What can you do for us?

We have in Orange, N. J., a veritable hive of hat making. We make hats almost for the world. Myriads of them are turned out to-day, or have been in the past. Men who worked at the boiler, and women at the finer work of trimming hats, are idle to-day. I received a letter from a woman who is the head of the Young Women's Christian Association over there, saying:

> Senator, we appeal to you to use your generous efforts to aid us.

So I ask, Mr. President, why may not I, with the same lofty patriotism, with the same hope, aim, and ambition to advance the well-being of my fellow men, press for the hat industry and the clay industry of New Jersey?

My fear is, sir—and I say it kindly—that if this policy is carried out to its finis it will prove a dangerous and disastrous policy, not only to our Commonwealth but to our country. Hence I shall vote against it. I voted for these various amendments because I felt there was as much reason for the amendment of the Senator from Oregon as there was for that of the Senator from Georgia, and as much reason for the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia as there was for that of the Senator from Alabama. But because I hope for the well-being, the blessing, and the general perpetuity of this glorious land, and love liberty and this splendid Government, I oppose your plan—not for spite, not for selfish glory, but for the well-being of the country.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have been somewhat surprised that the amiable and charming Senator from New Jersey, and the equally amiable Senator from West Virginia, got the impression that the Senator from Georgia had any reference to them in his caustic discussion of this question. I perfectly understood whom the Senator from Georgia meant, and particularly when he, as I think inadvertently and unfortunately, made allusion to legislation on another important matter which affected the section of the country from which I come. I am not laboring under any misapprehension as to whom the Senator meant.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator that I certainly was not thinking of him any more than anyone else. He is mistaken about that. If I was caustic or if I was extreme, it was entirely unintentional, and due to the very deep feeling I have about this measure, and the intense conviction that so small a thing might do so much good where so much danger is threatening.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator further, if he will permit me, that I did not say what I did until I knew perfectly well that the Senator meant me as much as he did the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not think the Senator from West Virginia was serious about his amendment until he said he was.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, I am ready to have the other two Senators included in the list; and we three will bear the odium, whatever it may be, of the criticisms of the Senator from Georgia, who I know is always kind, and who is earnest in the advocacy of any cause in which he believes.

Mr. CHILTON. I could have said that about half an hour ago. I do not believe I can say it now.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am not a humorist. A great many times during the past four months I have wished that I had the humor of the late Sunset Cox, or Adam Bede, or the late Member of the other House, Mr. Cushman, of Washington. When we have been laboring here, perspiring and worrying and wondering and calling the roll, occupying an hour to get a quorum, I have wished that I might be able to make a humorous speech after the quorum had been secured. As I say, I am not a humorist, and I do not intend to undertake to enter that field, because I know I would make a sorry failure of it if I did; and yet it is an old maxim, and one that we can all accept, that—

> A little nonsense now and then
> Is relished by the wisest men.

If I uttered any nonsense, I am sorry the Senator from Georgia was not wise enough to appreciate the significance of it, or the meaning that I intended.

In speaking of the lumber of Puget Sound, I was entirely serious; and, if the representations that have been made here are accurate, I really think the Senators from that State might well ask for the same kind of relief that is being asked for the cotton of the South. It is not, of course, in such an alarming condition, but it is a condition that nevertheless must give some anxiety to the people of that part of the country.

I may have descended to levity, perhaps unintentionally, in suggesting certain other things. I do not indulge in levity when I say that I believe the manufacturers of this country have just as good a right, when their industries are prostrate and their products not marketable in the other nations of the world, to ask that the Government shall get back of them and help them out by permitting them to have certificates issued against the products of their mills and factories as the cotton growers of the South or the farmers of any other section of the country. I may be wrong about that; but I will assure my friend the Senator from Georgia that I always endeavor to treat seriously every question that is before this body. I have been hoping that these emergency measures would end sometime, because I expect some of these days to have a Senator introduce a bill or call up a report to remove the charge of desertion from some soldier, and say it is an emergency measure. It is becoming common for us to say that. I have heard it said about some measures not much more important than a measure of the kind I have suggested.

I trust that the bill, if passed, will bring the desired relief.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I do not believe it will bring relief at all. It will help, though, in the very serious situation that confronts us, and I think it will help substantially, and much beyond the nominal cost involved.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to say that in the case of a section of the country that has made such marvelous progress in recovering from the disasters of a terrible war—and some of us have a recollection of what that meant—I certainly should not feel like standing in the way of any reasonable relief that can be secured. At the same time I feel we are getting too much into the habit of feeling that it does not make much difference what happens to the American people; the Government of the United States will take care of them. It is getting to be a habit that if there is financial trouble, or transportation trouble, or manufacturing trouble, or almost any other type of trouble that overtakes a section of our country, we ought to appeal to the Federal Government to come to our relief and help us out, destroying, as I think it is calculated to do, individual enterprise, ambition, and initiative.

So, as a general thing, I do not take kindly to that sort of legislation; but I have said all I care to say. I wish to assure my good friend the Senator from Georgia, whose amiability and good nature and courtesy largely come from the fact that he can trace his lineage back to New Hampshire, that I did not mean in any way to ridicule this matter, or to undertake to defeat it by any methods that are not creditable.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, in order to promote the passage of this bill I have so far avoided saying anything; and I would not now take up the time of the Senate except to express my views on this question.

I am not here either to pass compliments or to make apologies. To me this cotton bill in its original form seemed a true emergency measure. What were the conditions? The southern people have raised an enormous cotton crop. A large share of that crop has to be marketed abroad. The chief markets are in the countries where war is now prevailing—Germany, Belgium, France, Holland, and some of the neutral countries. There is no market for that cotton at present, and the cotton farmers who have raised it need money in order to subsist. They can get the money only by borrowing it on their cotton; and it is necessary to make some provision whereby cotton paper, so to speak—certificates relating to cotton—shall have a bankable value, so that the people can raise money.

The exigency was so great that it seemed to me there was much more necessity for passing a bill of that sort than the war-risk insurance bill; but I was very sorry to see these other matters injected into it. I do not think either tobacco or naval stores should go in the same bill, nor wheat, nor canned salmon, nor any of these products.

Wheat, corn, oats, canned salmon, apples, and peaches are food products. Europe has to have them, and there will be an instant demand, war or no war. All that remains to find an avenue and a market for our goods is to open transportation across the Atlantic. Fortunately, the embargo that existed immediately following the declaration of war has been to a large extent removed, and to-day there are being shipped abroad from this country millions of bushels of wheat, corn, and other products.

There is this difference between grain and cotton: A grain farmer in my part of the country—and it is so to-day—could always, if he wanted money, put a load of wheat in his wagon and go to the elevator and get cash for it. A cotton farmer in this contingency can not do it, unless he can borrow on his bale of cotton. The men can not furnish the capital necessary for it.

Now, I made no objection to the amendment relating to grain inspection. I made no objection for this reason: In the first place I regarded it as of no practical value. In the next place it did not interfere with our grain-inspection system. We have in the grain States what you men in the cotton States have not—a system of elevators and warehouses controlled by the State. We have such a system in Minnesota. Those elevators and warehouses are licensed. They are controlled by the State. They are under bond, and they are required to insure the contents of the warehouses and elevators for the benefit of the holders of the tickets. During the last 25 years there never has been a time when our people—farmers, merchants, and everybody else—could not go to any bank and borrow money on those wheat receipts and wheat certificates. In fact, they have been regarded as the very best of security, and men could borrow at a lower rate of interest on that kind of paper than on almost any other kind of paper.

There will be no trouble with us in the Northwest. Our wheat will be in demand. The wheat crop in the Northwest this year is a light crop, not much more than half a crop, on account of the black rust and the blight and the hot weather. We will have a market for it, and there will be no trouble about raising money.

It is not so with the people of the South. Therefore, while I have made no opposition to these several amendments, except that I did vote against the canned-salmon amendment, and I intend to vote against the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON], and I made no objection to the amendment relating to grain, because I deemed it entirely unnecessary, yet I think in all reason, if we want to enact a pure, naked emergency measure, we ought to confine it to cotton, and cotton alone, because it is only intended to live for nine months after the declaration of peace, or, at the utmost, for two years.

However that may be, I trust the bill will pass, even with these bad amendments attached to it. I shall vote for it, because I realize that the cotton planters of the South need this above everything else. I hope some of these objectionable matters may be eliminated from it in conference; but whether they are eliminated or not, in view of the great importance of relief for the cotton planters, I feel it to be my duty to take the poison together with the good things in the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. WEEKS. The Senator suggests that the passage of this bill is vitally needed. I noticed in the papers yesterday a statement made by Mr. Festus J. Wade, president of a large trust company in St. Louis, speaking for the bankers of St. Louis, to the effect that it was unnecessary for the Government to make any provision for financing the cotton crop, because the bankers of St. Louis, through their associates, had made ample provision for it. I desire to ask the Senator if he knows anything about that and if that is true?

Mr. NELSON. I know nothing about it. I saw the statement in the newspapers, but to my mind it is utterly impossible. I do not think all the banks in St. Louis or in the regional reserve bank at St. Louis could command money enough to finance the cotton crop of the South. It would take over a billion dollars to handle that crop at the present time. When bankers come in and say that, they say it in a spirit of selfishness, because they do not like to have the Government interfere with their banking arrangements. We all know, when it comes to that matter, that the bankers are as selfish a lot of people as there are anywhere in the community, and, of course, they realize that if the Government turns in and helps part of their mission will be gone.

Mr. WEEKS. Of course the Senator will recognize the fact that the issuance of certificates does not obviate the necessity for the banks to advance money. It is simply advancing it on a different form of paper. The Government does not advance any money.

Mr. NELSON. I want to say to the Senator that it depends a good deal on the form and the character of the certificate as to whether or not money can be obtained on it. The object of this legislation is to give the certificate for cotton such a value that good banks all over the country will be ready to utilize it and give credit on it.

There is one feature of the bill that I think it would strengthen it to amend so as to make it analogous to our grain-inspection law in Minnesota, and that is to require these warehouses that obtain licenses and act under this law, in addition to giving bonds, to insure the cotton for the benefit of the holders of the receipts. I should be very glad to see that provision inserted in the bill, and I think it would greatly strengthen the certificates.

Mr. President, while it is all very well in normal times to stand upon high constitutional principles and say that we ought not to aid private parties, in all great emergencies we have to come to the relief of people. War and the exigencies of war bring to us duties and burdens that are not incident to peace. For years I have heard the banks criticize the greenback dollar and claim that it was only a paper dollar, a promissory note, and that we ought to get it out of circulation as soon as we could and get on a gold basis. Yet in an emergency who are the quickest to come here and ask us to allow them to issue millions of dollars of emergency currency under the Aldrich-Vreeland bill? These worshipers of gold in times of peace, who warn us against using any other basis for our circulation than gold, when an emergency arises are as ready to drop gold as a child is to drop a live coal that it has in its hand.

We passed the other day an emergency measure to increase our shipping—a most beneficent law. It is an entering wedge, and I hope it will lead to the acquisition by the United States of a merchant marine that will plow the seas and control our commerce in war and in peace as it did in the days before the Civil War and as the New England clipper ships did in the olden times.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, does the Senator seriously believe that the legislation we have passed is going to do very much in that direction?

Mr. NELSON. I do. I have faith in that legislation. I know how the Senator feels. He feels that no ship is fit to navigate the ocean with the American flag on it unless it is built in a New England shipyard.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no, Mr. President. That is not my attitude at all. I have no interest in the New England shipyards. There is not one in my State.

Mr. NELSON. I did not refer to the Senator's State. I said in a New England shipyard.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a rather ungenerous suggestion. That is not my attitude at all. I voted for that emergency legislation——

Mr. NELSON. I know the Senator did.

Mr. GALLINGER. And I hope some good will come out of it; but that it will be the basis for a real rehabilitation of the American merchant marine I confess I can not and do not believe.

Mr. NELSON. We have made a beginning. We have to learn our A B C's before we do anything else. That is a beginning.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but sometimes when a child learns its A B C's you never can teach it anything beyond that. I have seen such instances.

Mr. NELSON. Well, those children are so saturated with certain isms that they never can get further under any circumstances.

We supplemented that legislation by war-risk insurance. Some criticized that as being of a paternalistic character. We did that, however. In doing that we followed in the footsteps of other nations. England has issued its war-risk insurance. France has issued its war-risk insurance, and the other countries have done the same thing. Even little Norway, with its merchant marine, the fourth in the merchant marines of the world, has issued its war-risk insurance. They are all doing just what we have been doing; and in time of war we can not go back and stand upon the high and lofty principles that we do in time of peace. We must meet the emergency, because our Government is established for the welfare of the American people and not for mere academic principles.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I have been in favor of this bill because I believe, as has been said by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], that it was practically necessary emergency legislation. I believe that the small cotton man, the individual farmer, the 8-bale man, would derive great benefit from it. He is the man who has to borrow money from the local merchant generally, or from the little local bank, and with a $60 bale of cotton has borrowed up to this time, I suppose, $30 or more. There is no market now for his cotton. The small merchant needs his money; the small local banker needs his money. The proposition is simply to put his cotton in a shape where certificates representing the ownership can be presented in New York or in any other portion of the United States. In that way, I believe, at least some help would be extended to the small cotton man in the South.

I can not vote for this bill with the amendments which have been placed upon it. An entirely different proposition presents itself, Mr. President, when the foodstuffs, the necessaries of life of the 90,000,000 people of this country are concerned. The object of the bill as amended if it has any effect is simply to enable the wheat grower to reap a benefit, and I say as to the wheat grower, Mr. President, that is a mistake. It is not the wheat grower, because the wheat has gone already out of the hands of the wheat grower into the hands of the speculator and the elevator man, and these two practically now own the wheat and will hold it until the time when they will get the price which suits them for the wheat.

There has been legislation in the history of the Government in matters of foodstuffs in time of emergency, and the legislation heretofore has been in the interests of the man who bought and ate the bread. The object has been to control the prices so that no one might forestall or take advantage of opportunities to demand high prices for the foodstuffs for the people to live on. It has surprised me during this debate here that not one word has been said by those who have spoken upon this matter, and some have spoken several times, of the man who has to eat, the man who has to feed his family of little children, to whom we should look to some extent, at any rate.

I am against any such amendments as would allow the salmon factory to place its food products in a warehouse and enable the factory to bank that stuff and to secure money with which to carry it for the purpose of oppressing the people who must eat the product. I am against the proposition, as it is submitted here in this amendment, to issue certificates on grain, for the same reason. Canada already, we understand from the press, is attempting to regulate the prices for the benefit of the consumers, for the benefit of those who must eat the product of the wheat; and here we are simply proposing by legislation to enable the man who now holds the wheat—not the man who raises it, not the man who has parted with it, but when he has sold it to the elevator or sold it to the speculator—to control the food products upon which the people of this country must rely and to hold it until he can get what he pleases for it or export it. Why? They may wait until the price in Europe rises above what it is to-day and enable them to handle not only the European portion of the crop that would naturally go to Europe, but we are passing legislation of this kind without any provision to prevent it, which has been prohibited by the laws of all civilized countries ever since laws were first made. Without any attempt to throw restrictions around the warehousing, the holding, and the speculation in the foodstuffs, we, by this amendatory legislation, put them in the same class as the cotton of the South.

I was in favor of the bill as it stood. I am absolutely opposed to it with the various amendments that have been placed upon it, unless there is some provision with those amendments in the bill for the protection of the consumers of the United States.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] has indicated that so far as the amendment relating to grain is concerned it is in the interest of speculators in grain. The truth is that the speculators in grain took advantage of the situation that existed when transportation was stopped and the necessities of the farmers who produced the grain, and the price was put down very low. As I said the other day, in the section of the country from which I come millions of bushels of wheat were sold for 60 cents a bushel, which was exceedingly low. That wheat now is in the possession of the elevators, and I might say the speculators, the millers, and jobbers, and exporters, and the price has gone up, so that in the same section of the country it is now selling for 75 and 80 cents.

If we had had legislation similar to this, or if we had had laws that would accomplish what this purports to accomplish, it would not have been necessary for the farmer to have sold his wheat to the speculator. He could have placed it in storage, and with his certificate he could have handled his business and met his obligations. It is to relieve him from such opportunities of oppression from those who deal in his products that makes me favor this kind of legislation.

There is no difference in principle between the situation which confronts the cotton farmer of the South and the wheat farmer of the West. Wheat and cotton are staple products, and the farmer is not interested in any combination or trust to force up the price and to extort from the people of the United States more than he is entitled to for his product. The price of flour has been advancing not because the cost of producing flour is any greater, but flour made from wheat that was purchased for 60 cents a bushel has been advanced, not flour from wheat that was purchased for 80 or 90 cents.

This legislation is not in the interest of the speculator in wheat any more than it is in the interest of the speculator in cotton, and to draw a distinction is unfair to the wheat producers of the West and the Senators who are attempting to help them and to protect them from the disaster that has been visited upon them. While millions of bushels of wheat have already been marketed, there are still millions of bushels to market.

I do not care to style this as emergency legislation. I am not for amendments that limit its operation. I think we ought to have well-considered legislation of a permanent character, so as to meet any emergency that might come upon the producing class of our country, the farmer, who can not combine and reap the greatest reward from the production.

We have bills here pending which seek to relieve farmers from the operations of the antitrust laws. To my mind they are ridiculous, unnecessary, and impracticable. The farmers can not organize a trust. They do not want to be permitted to organize trusts. What they are asking is protection from trusts that are organized to deal in the products which come from their toil and not permission to organize a trust themselves. They do not organize and extort from the people unreasonable prices for what they have to sell. If they were disposed to do it, it would be impossible for them to do it; there are too many of them, and competition is too widespread and universal among them.

Any permanent legislation that will bring about opportunities for the farmer to store products that can be stored with safety, so that he may utilize the value which he owns in those products, products that will command cash on the market, is not unwise legislation. It is safe, sane, and beneficial legislation. I regret, sir, that limitations of any kind have been placed upon it.

Mr. FALL. May I ask the Senator from Kansas a question?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I join the Senator in the hope that such legislation may be enacted at some time for the benefit of the farmer; but along with such legislation does not the Senator join with me in the belief that there should be such restrictions as will protect the consumer?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly; I am in favor of that, and I thought we were going to try to have legislation here that would protect the consumer from combinations and trusts.

Mr. FALL. We are undertaking to protect the farmer—that is, the food owner, the man who holds to-day the people's food—but we are undertaking to protect him by simple amendments to a bill which does in no way prevent forestalling or the holding of the people's foodstuffs to their detriment or injury.

Mr. BRISTOW. Any legislation that is for the purpose of breaking up any combination such as Mr. Patton and a few others entered into to force the prices, of course, the Senator knows I am heartily in favor of. I think a lot of those fellows ought to be in the penitentiary. They are a curse to humanity just the same as are the Wall Street speculators, who ought to be in the penitentiary instead of being put in places of high authority in the affairs of the Government.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Kansas that the men of whom he speaks do not deal in wheat. They deal in what we call "wind wheat."

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; imaginary, future wheat.

Mr. GRONNA. I want to say for the benefit of my friend the Senator from New Mexico that, so far as the West is concerned, not a bushel of this year's crop is in the hands of the speculators. It is all in the hands of the farmers.

Mr. FALL. I want to answer the Senator from North Dakota to this extent: The Senator is one of the great farmers of this country. I am one of the small farmers of the country. I know something, in my small way, about farming, as well as the Senator does in his much larger way. I am dependent upon farming entirely, aside from the salary which I receive here for my very brilliant labors in this body. I know something about wheat. I raise wheat to some small extent. I know something about hay. While the Senator is speaking of the wheat crop, why has he not said something about the hay crop, which bears the relation of 8 to 5 to wheat in total value? There is $800,000,000 worth of hay and $500,000,000 worth of wheat, on an average, in a year. Hay is the one great product of my part of the country. Alfalfa hay alone in New Mexico is worth more than the entire mineral output of the great mineral State of Arizona, which I believe stands first to-day in copper production, for instance. It is one of the great crops which we raise. The price for it is fixed not by the local market, but is fixed by an interstate relationship, because we ship to Louisiana, Georgia, and other Southern States.

I am not here asking, sir, for protection for hay, although my hay product might amount to almost as much, possibly, as the total value of the wheat of some individual wheat farmers in the Northwest. I bale my hay. Hay can be kept for years. But I am not asking any special legislation to help in getting some money for the hay product.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FALL. I do.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to remind my good friend from New Mexico that, so far as I am personally concerned, I shall not take advantage of the new law. I do not expect to receive a single certificate or ask the Secretary to issue me a certificate, so far as I am concerned. I make this statement in order to relieve the mind of the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. FALL. My mind, so far as the Senator who has just spoken is concerned, needs no relief, except from the burden, possibly, of admiration for that Senator's sincerity and honesty. But I do not think that the Senator has looked upon the other side of the wheat proposition. If we raise the price of hay, Mr. President, it might not affect the foreign market a great deal, but it would affect the price of every pound of meat that the people of the United States eat. The price of every pound of mutton, every pound of pork, and every pound of beef would be affected by the increase in the price of hay, because not only the corn which the Senators have spoken of, but hay, are absolutely necessary for the making of meat.

But, Mr. President, as I said, when the Senator from Kansas can join me in working out some scheme by which we can help the farmer and keep him out of the hands of the speculator, help him to get a good price for his products, I will vote for it, provided that at the same time there are restrictions thrown around the disposition of that product, so that advantage will not be taken of those who must have foodstuffs to sustain life and who do not raise them on the farm.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON].

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] seems to be under the impression, in speaking upon the amendment, that if it were adopted the Government would have no authority to grade and certify the grade of peaches and apples. His amendment provides that all the provisions of the bill relating to cotton shall apply to peaches and apples in so far as they are applicable. The bill, in section 9, provides:

> That any warehouse receipt or certificate of the grade or class of cotton issued under this act may specify the grade or class of the cotton covered thereby in accordance with the official cotton standards of the United States, as the same may be fixed and promulgated under authority of law from time to time by the Secretary of Agriculture, or in accordance with any other standard. If such receipts and certificates state the grade or class, they shall show the standard in accordance with which the cotton has been graded or classified.

If the Senator's amendment should be adopted, the same provision will be applied to the products which his amendment specifies. It was mainly for that reason I thought I ought to state I would be compelled to vote against the amendment. I think that if the Government should be authorized to fix a standard of grades of apples and peaches, if that should be deemed wise legislation, there ought to be some consideration given by Congress before conferring that authority upon the Secretary of Agriculture as to the standard which he is to fix or the rules by which he shall be guided in fixing the standard.

There are different standards in different parts of the country. One section of the country will insist upon a certain standard, another section of the country upon another standard. It does not apply only to the quality of the fruit, but there may be included under the very general provisions of the bill, all of which I have not read, the fixing of the manner of packing, the size and character of the packing boxes, and, as I have stated before, what is satisfactory to one part of the country in that respect is not satisfactory to another part. The standard should be discussed and fixed by statute and not left to the unlimited discretion of the Secretary.

This bill has for its sole purpose the grading and certifying of the grades of cotton and the licensing of the warehouses in which it is stored, the establishment of what may be called bonded warehouses. If it is considered advisable to establish standards for warehouses for the storing of fruit, of course if peaches and apples are included there is no reason why other kinds of fruit should not be included also. That is a matter which should be thoroughly discussed and the interested parties heard from before a law is enacted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose that peaches were inspected and put into a warehouse as of a certain grade, how long would those peaches retain that grade? Are they not so perishable that any rule of this kind could not be applied to them? Would it not be ridiculous to attempt to apply it to any perishable fresh fruit?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It certainly would be so far as peaches are concerned, in my judgment. How long a peach would retain its quality in storage would depend somewhat upon the variety of the peach; but a certificate would be issued under this bill that a peach was stored of a certain grade. As the Senator has very well suggested, no information would be given by that certificate as to whether or not at any certain time the peach was a marketable commodity or retained the standard which had been fixed by the Government at the time the certificate was issued.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Washington knows, if he will excuse me, that cotton can be kept for years without deteriorating. Wheat is really better the second year than it is the year that it is raised; it brings a higher market price when it is a year old than it does directly from the farm. I assume that wheat would be good for 5 or 6 years if kept in a good dry place, and I do not know but that it might be good for 30 years if kept in a proper place. This bill would apply to those products which we can store and can keep. When we include the ordinary grains and cotton, I think we have covered the ground unless we go into canned goods.

Mr. POINDEXTER. To appreciate the difficulty the Government would be confronted with if the bill should be extended to include perishable fruit it is only necessary to read section 10, which provides for inspection and reinspection and reexamination, at such time as the Secretary of Agriculture may see fit, of cotton which is proposed to be stored under the bill. A system of inspection of peaches from time to time to ascertain whether or not the certificate which had been issued for them was still a good certificate would be manifestly impracticable.

I do not think any such authority ought to be conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture or that any such service is necessary.

I think it ought to appear while we are discussing this amendment just what it does provide, so I will read a few lines of the bill:

SEC. 10. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cause inspections and examinations to be made of any cotton which, in any warehouse receipt or certificate issued pursuant to this act, has been certified or represented to conform to any grade or class established in the official cotton standards of the United States and to ascertain whether the cotton—

"Or the peaches or apples," I may interpolate—

is in fact of the specified grade or class. Whenever, after opportunity for hearing has been afforded to the owner of the cotton involved and the licensee concerned, it is determined by the Secretary that any such cotton has been incorrectly certified or represented to conform to a specified grade or class of the official cotton standards of the United States, he may publish his findings.

Section 9 provides:

That any warehouse receipt or certificate of the grade or class of cotton issued under this act may specify the grade or class of the cotton covered thereby, etc.

I have read that. Very general authority is given to the Secretary of Agriculture under section 14 of the bill, which provides:

SEC. 14. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall, from time to time, make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the efficient execution of the provisions of this act.

It is difficult to tell what the Secretary of Agriculture would not be allowed to do under that general authority; and whether or not such rules or regulations could be framed by him as would be satisfactory to the different sections of the country interested in these products is a matter which would require some conference between them. There ought to be some understanding in advance of the principles by which the Secretary would be guided before he is clothed with this comprehensive and unlimited power to make rules and regulations.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. CHILTON. I merely want to ask the Senator how he thinks the Secretary of Agriculture will grade canned salmon, an amendment as to which was inserted for the benefit of his section of the country?

Mr. POINDEXTER. He would grade them a good deal in the same way that meat is graded. I will say, however, that I did not propose the amendment to which the Senator from West Virginia refers.

Mr. CHILTON. Salmon are packed in cans. How can they be graded in the cans? I voted with the Senator to include canned salmon. I took the word of Senators from that section that such an amendment was needed. I recognize that a war emergency exists; and I suppose that we should have faith in the Secretary of Agriculture that he would not do a foolish or a vain thing; and that he would certainly not injure any section of the country.

Apples are raised in the section of country from which the Senator from Washington comes; they are raised in West Virginia; they are raised throughout the Valley of Virginia. Certainly in a great emergency like this, when the foreign market is taken from us, we ought to get together. Instead of dwelling on grades, we ought to have in mind preserving the interests of the tens of thousands of people who are engaged in the industry; and we ought to recollect that the great thing is to get something out of this legislation for our people, and not have a contention as to how these articles are to be graded. I am perfectly willing that all the apples shall come up to the Washington apple grade, if it is so desired. I do not care whether the department grades them on the basis of Washington apples or West Virginia apples, the Roman Beauty, the Ben Davis, the Grimes Golden, or what not. I want something to preserve the product of these people.

Is not the Senator surprised that anyone should make the objection here that there has any trust entered into this matter? As a rule, we can not go out and sell 1 barrel of apples, or 2 barrels of apples, or 10 barrels of apples. The object of the amendment is to save them for a particular time when there is a market; when they can be handled in quantities, and to put them in warehouses or cold storage where they can remain.

I am not interested in the grade of apples, but I am interested in the fact that there is an emergency, and tens of thousands of people in the Senator's State and in my own State will be greatly injured if we do not very soon do something to help them. I think this is not a time to bring up technical questions.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from West Virginia to the fact that the further authority is conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture, under this comprehensive bill, of issuing licenses to inspectors. Whether or not that is feasible as to peaches certainly, or as to apples, in my opinion, is extremely doubtful, and it is of doubtful advisability whether there ought to be Government inspection of peaches. Section 6 of the bill provides as follows:

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of Agriculture may, upon presentation to him of satisfactory proof of competency, issue to any person a license to grade or classify cotton, and to certificate the grade or class thereof, under such rules and regulations as may be made pursuant to this act.

I am not in favor at this time of voting for a measure conferring that authority upon the Secretary of Agriculture as to peaches and apples.

In conclusion, I wish to call attention to the recent law which was passed in the Agricultural appropriation bill appropriating $91,000 to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture in the establishment of standards for grades of cotton. So that the emergency, if there is an emergency—and I think that the relief which would be obtained from this bill is very largely exaggerated—has been already partly covered by this Congress in the appropriation of that considerable sum of money. The act provides:

For investigating the ginning, handling, grading, baling, gin compressing, and wrapping of cotton, and the establishment and demonstration of standards for the different grades thereof, and for carrying into effect the provisions of law relating thereto, $91,000.

All of the work covered by that appropriation of $91,000 is in direct line of the work provided for in this bill. So far as examination of the cotton itself is concerned, the bill simply provides for an extension of the work, so that the entire expense of what is necessary to be done in carrying out the purposes of this bill will not have to be paid for by the appropriation contained in the bill itself.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In other words, the Senator points out that, so far as cotton is concerned, Congress has already provided for a considerable portion of this work.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, this bill simply means that the department may classify and designate or arrange to classify and designate it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Exactly; and I think it involves no new principle whatever from that which was accepted and recognized by Congress in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. And I want to say that if the Senator had read on a little further he would have found $76,320 appropriated for investigating the handling and grading of grain; so that the Senator's remark will apply equally to grain.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. CHILTON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CHILTON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] the yeas are 12 and the nays 36, Senators GORE, HOLLIS, and THOMAS being in the Chamber and having announced their pairs, and not voting. The Chair declares the amendment rejected.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I now offer the same amendment with the words "appies" and "peaches" stricken out, so that it will apply to oil alone. I will test the good faith of the critics of the amendment. I ask that the Secretary may state the amendment with those words stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment as modified.

The Secretary read as follows:

That all the provisions hereof are extended to include tanks, tankage, and pipe lines for the storage of oil, together with the inspection, classification, and the issuance of receipts and certificates therefor, to the same extent, so far as applicable, as the same are made applicable to the warehouses for the storage and classification of cotton, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. CHILTON. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, what is the motion—to lay on the table?

The VICE PRESIDENT. To lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair and withhold my vote. I ask to be counted as present.

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. It being obvious that my vote is necessary in order to help make a quorum, I vote "yea."

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS. If necessary to make a quorum, I will vote. I vote "yea."

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the motion to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] the yeas are 25 and the nays are 23, and 2 Senators have requested that they be counted as present. That discloses the presence of a quorum, and the motion to lay on the table is agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have intimated two or three times that I would, perhaps, offer an amendment including textile manufacturing and the manufacture of boots and shoes, but I have concluded not to do so. I shall content myself by saying that if the conditions should overtake our manufacturing industries that we encountered in the years 1893 and 1894 in New England I think we would have quite as strong a case as the cotton raisers have at the present time. That does not exist to-day, however; and while there is a good deal of disturbance, I think our manufacturers can get along without Government aid. For that reason I shall refrain from offering the amendment that I suggested I might offer.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have sent to the desk an amendment, which I wish to offer and have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 3, it is proposed to strike out the words "to call upon qualified persons not regularly in the service of the United States" and to insert "to appoint qualified persons, after examination to be held under his direction to determine their competency," so that, if amended, it will read as follows:

He is authorsed, in his discretion, to appoint qualified persons, after examination to be held under his direction to determine their competency, for temporary assistance in carrying out the purposes of this act, and out of the moneys appropriated by this act to pay the salaries and expenses thereof.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. The only purpose of the amendment which I have offered is that an examination shall be given under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture for the employees who are to be taken into the service under the provisions of this act.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. So far as I am concerned I do not object to the amendment, because I know the Secretary contemplates having an examination and testing the proficiency before he makes any appointments.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

O Lord God, gracious and merciful, wise and just, our heavenly Father, renew our faith in Thee and our confidence in human nature in spite of the terrible spectacle presented to the world by the awful conflict now raging in the nations round about us. Grant, O most merciful Father, that out of it may come a clearer vision, a broader conception of right and truth and justice, which will teach us the art of living together in peace; that brotherly love become the ruling passion of men and of nations under the spiritual leadership of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SELDOMRIDGE, for two days, to attend the funeral of a relative.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Platt, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6261. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase not to exceed 15,000,000 ounces of silver bullion, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 6261. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase not to exceed 15,000,000 ounces of silver bullion, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

THE SEAMEN'S BILL.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the approval of the Journal to-morrow it shall be in order to move to suspend the rules and pass the bill S. 136, known as the seamen's bill, with certain committee amendments, and if a second is demanded it shall be considered as ordered; that two hours of debate on the bill shall be in order, one-half of the time to be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], the ranking minority member of the committee.

Mr. BARNHART. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Printing has half a dozen little printing bills that have been hanging fire for four or six weeks, some very important, as they pertain to existing conditions abroad. I have tried several times to get permission to bring them up, but something has been in the way. I am going to ask the gentleman from Missouri if he will concede me the right to present these little bills before taking up his matter to-morrow, immediately after the approval of the Journal. If he will do it, I will not object.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow a suggestion?

Mr. BARNHART. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. I think the bills mentioned by the gentleman from Indiana will not be in order to-morrow except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BARNHART. What is to-morrow?

Mr. MANN. Tuesday; and the special order agreed to by the House did not exempt reports from the Committee on Printing. Very likely there would be no objection, if unanimous consent is asked after the other matter is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that to-morrow, immediately after the approval of the Journal, it shall be in order to move to suspend the rules upon the bill S. 136, the seamen's bill, with certain committee amendments, and if a second is demanded, that the second shall be considered as ordered, and that two hours of debate on the bill shall be in order, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE]. Is there objection?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question. Have these proposed amendments been printed?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I had the bill printed with the amendments shown in brackets, and the bill will be available for distribution this afternoon for the Members, and they can see at once what the amendments are.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I would like to ask the gentleman what is the substance of these amendments, or of the main amendments?

Mr. ALEXANDER. There are no amendments that change the principles of the bill. They make plain some provisions that were thought to be ambiguous and some other amendments nullify some of the provisions with reference to lifeboat equipment and in other regards.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman about the requirements as to able seamen. As the bill is now amended, does it provide that a man placed in a lifeboat must know something about handling a boat?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Section 14 of the bill conforms to the London convention. It provides that a lifeboat shall be in charge of a licensed officer or able seaman, and that the other men in charge of lifeboats shall be known as lifeboat men and be qualified to handle lifeboats and shall receive certificates as such.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does it limit the crew of the lifeboats to the deck crew?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It does not.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That has been changed?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Materially changed, I think.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Is there any amendment with reference to what is required to make an able seaman?

Mr. ALEXANDER. A service of three years on deck at sea or two years on the Great Lakes or other inland waters to be rated an able seaman.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. One other question I would like to ask the gentleman. Does the bill as amended still attempt to prescribe to foreign nations the character of the crew they shall carry on their vessels?

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is not any limitation in the bill to vessels of the United States.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. What I want to know is whether the bill still prescribes for a vessel coming into our port how that foreign vessel shall pay its sailors? Does it still prescribe the qualifications for sailors?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The bill is the same as it was when it passed the House and Senate in the last Congress in that regard. The requirements are the same as in the bill when it passed the Senate on the 23d of October last.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether any change has been made in the Senate provision as to the excursion steamers on the Great Lakes? It was represented and strongly protested by lake-traffic men that under the provisions of the bill when it passed the Senate it would be impossible for a lake coast steamer to operate.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The bill has been materially modified in that regard to avoid that very hardship.

Mr. STAFFORD. In that particular does the bill at present mollify the objections of the lake-traffic men and the owners of excursion steamers generally?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I think so; very materially.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WATER POWER ON THE PUBLIC DOMAIN.

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the bill (H. R. 16673) to provide for the development of water power and the use of public lands in relation thereto, and for other purposes, which comes over from Saturday with the previous question ordered. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion to recommit, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands with instructions to strike out, on page 7, all after the word "into," in line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following substitute for the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, line 3, strike out all after the word "plant" and the remainder of the section down to the word "provided," in line 19, and insert the following: "one-half the proceeds of all charges or rentals shall be paid to the State within the boundaries of which the hydroelectric energy is generated, for the support of schools and the construction of roads, as the State legislature may direct; and one-half shall be paid into the reclamation fund; and any lessee under this act of lands entered or owned in accordance with the terms of section 10 of this act shall pay to said entryman or owner the value of the lands so taken, other than for power purposes, and for the improvements thereon. And nothing contained in this act shall affect the rights of homesteaders or desert entrymen initiated prior to the inclusion of their lands in a power-site withdrawal."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion and all amendments thereto.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Mondell substitute.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MONDELL) there were—ayes 20, noes 67.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 47, nays 160, answered "present" 12, not voting 213, as follows:

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island (to recommit) with Mr. COPLEY (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. RAINEY with Mr. NELSON.

Mr. RUSSELL with Mr. LA FOLLETTE.

Mr. DIES with Mr. BARCHFELD.

Mr. DECKER with Mr. SHREVE.

Mr. DIFENDERFER with Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I move that writs be issued for the absent Members and that they be brought in.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The writs are issued for these absentees, and the Chair desires the Sergeant at Arms to bring them in here. The men who stay here and try to transact the business of this House have an absolute right to have a quorum here, and those who are absent are not treating the House right and are not treating the people of the United States right, especially those Members who are loiling around town and are not home for any reason. [Applause.] The Clerk will call my name.

The name of Mr. CLARK of Missouri was called, and he voted "nay," as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. FERRIS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, on the House Calendar is the bill H. R. 13219. I wish to inquire of the Speaker whether or not that bill is on the proper calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the bill carefully and thinks it ought to be on the Union Calendar, and it will be so transferred.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District legislation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering District legislation.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 5.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of District legislation, with Mr. WINGO in the chair.

ALLEY DWELLINGS IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call up the bill H. R. 13219.

Mr. BURNETT. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNETT. I believe when the committee arose before the Plaza bill was the unfinished business. I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry in order to find out if anything else can displace that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that the previous question had not been ordered on the bill, and therefore it is not unfinished business.

Mr. BURNETT. The general debate, I think, only lacked 40 minutes of being concluded. I remember there was some reservation of time by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. LOGUE], and when the committee rose it reported that no resolution had been reached, and District business was the business that was on at that time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the Chair will look at the unfinished business calendar he will see that this Plaza bill is not on it, and the rule is that until the previous question has been ordered it is unfinished business. The previous question was not ordered the last time, and therefore it is not unfinished business.

Mr. MANN. The Chair will note under the head of "Unfinished business," on page 11, that the first on the calendar is "S. J. Res. 129, Plaza award resolution. (Pending in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, July 13, 1914.)"

The gentleman from Kentucky was mistaken in thinking that this was not on the calendar under the head of unfinished business.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The previous question had not been ordered.

Mr. MANN. Of course, Mr. Chairman, the previous question could not have been ordered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, but a unanimous-consent agreement was entered into in that committee, which is binding on the committee, fixing the time for further general debate in the committee. That was an agreement by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. That is all true, but there has been no agreement to take it up. There is nothing binding on the committee as to what it shall or shall not take up.

Mr. MANN. But there was an agreement by unanimous consent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And when the bill did come up there was to be 40 minutes debate on it, 20 minutes on a side. That is the extent of the agreement.

Mr. MANN. The agreement was that on the next District day there should be 40 minutes' debate on the bill. That was a unanimous-consent agreement. I gathered it from reading the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule if nobody else desires to be heard. The Chair will read from section 865, page 387 of the Manual:

Business unfinished when the Committee of the Whole rises remains unfinished, to be considered first in order when the House next goes into Committee of the Whole to consider that business.

Under that the Chair is of the opinion that the Senate joint resolution 129 is the unfinished business. It is on the Calendar for Unfinished Business, and the Chair is of the opinion that the unfinished business can not be set aside by the chairman calling up another bill.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, what is the status of the pending resolution as the unfinished business?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will pardon me a moment, I have not made a motion to go into committee for the purpose of considering that particular bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion of the gentleman was to go into the Committee of the Whole to consider District business.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HOWARD. It occurs to me, Mr. Chairman, that if the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia had made a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a specific bill and the House had so ordered, then that particular bill would be considered by the consent of the House; but in the absence of any specific indication of the particular legislation to be considered, it would seem that the unfinished business would have the first call. But would it be too late now for the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia to submit to the pleasure of the House the question as to whether the House should consider the alley bill or the unfinished business at the time of the last sitting of the committee? It is a question, it seems to me, that is for the House itself to determine in its judgment whether it would lay the unfinished business aside or take up this particular bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion being general, simply to take up District bills, the rule regarding unfinished business would operate, and for that reason the Chair sees no way of getting around its consideration now, unless——

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee take up for consideration the bill (H. R. 13219) to provide, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, and safety, for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in the alleys in the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] moves that the committee take up the bill H. R. 13219 in lieu of the unfinished business. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 52, noes 17.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill H. R. 13219.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has not yet been reported. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13219) to provide, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, and safety, for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in the alleys in the District of Columbia.

Be it enacted, etc., That after the expiration of 10 years after the passage of this act, no person shall occupy as a dwelling, and no person, partnership, association, or corporation, having the authority and power to prevent, shall permit to be occupied as a dwelling any building in any alley in the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to acquire in the name of said District ownership in fee simple of such real property as in the judgment of said commissioners is needed for the conversion of any inhabited alley in said District into a street not less than 40 feet wide from building line or building lines, whenever in the judgment of said commissioners the public welfare requires such conversion, and to acquire like ownership of such other real property in the square in which such alley is located as in the judgment of said commissioners may be necessary for the public welfare, for the laying out on such street of lots in size and shape suitable for residential and business purposes, having due regard, however, to the preservation of the availability for residential and business purposes of all lots and portions of lots in said square which are not acquired by said commissioners.

Mr. RAKER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the part of the bill that is stricken out be dispensed with and that the substitute be read in lieu of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asks unanimous consent that the reading of that portion of the bill which is stricken out be dispensed with and that the substitute be read in lieu of it. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make the observation that in order to understand the substitute it is necessary that the Members should listen to the reading of the original bill. There do not seem to be many doing it. I object, and make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members are present—a quorum. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. That all proceedings for acquiring ownership of any real property in the District of Columbia under the provisions of this act, except as herein otherwise provided, shall be under and in accordance with the provisions of sections 1608 to 1612, inclusive, of the Code of Law for said District, which are hereby extended and made applicable to the purposes of this act: Provided, first, That the plat filed by the Commissioners of said District to show the real property which it is desired to acquire shall show all streets, alleys, and lots which it is proposed to lay out, if such property be acquired, and the petition filed by said commissioners shall set forth in exact terms the restrictions, if any, that said commissioners propose to put upon the future use of the lots, if any, to be thus laid out; and such lots and restrictions as to the use thereof shall not thereafter be varied except as may be authorized by the court before which the cause is tried, on the application of said commissioners, or as may be expressly authorized by law: Provided, second, That in any condemnation proceedings for carrying out the provisions of this act assessments for benefits may be made against any and all real property in said District, wherever situated, that the jury finds as a matter of fact to be actually benefited and to the extent that the jury finds such benefit: And provided, third, That the amount assessed under this section as benefits shall be not less than one-half of the balance remaining after subtracting from the total damages as determined under the provisions of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, plus the cost of the condemnation proceedings, an amount equal to the value of all of the land acquired by the District of Columbia for subdivision into lots as hereinafter provided, the value of such land to be determined upon the basis of the amount awarded the owners thereof, by the jury of condemnation; and the amount not assessed as benefits shall be paid from such appropriations and in such manner as Congress may from time to time by law direct.

SEC. 4. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, having acquired the ownership of any real property in said District under the provisions of sections 2 and 3 of this act, shall cause the land to be laid out so as to establish a street or streets not less than 40 feet wide, each such street to run straight through the square from one of the streets bounding said square to another, and shall cause such alleys, if any, to be laid out as are necessary in the judgment of said commissioners for the convenient service of all lots in said square. And the land remaining after the laying out of such streets and alleys shall be subdivided by said commissioners into lots of sizes convenient for the erection of buildings for residential or business purposes, subject, however, to such restrictions concerning the use of said lots as said commissioners shall deem expedient for the public welfare. Whenever after the making of any such subdivision it appears to said commissioners to be to the interest of the District of Columbia to sell any lot or lots so laid out, or any construction thereon, or both, said commissioners shall give public notice of their intention so to do, by publishing such notice at least three times at intervals of not less than 5 nor more than 10 days in one or more daily newspapers of general circulation in said District, and by posting a notice of like purport on each lot which, or the construction thereon, is offered for sale, which said notice shall show when and where bids will be received; and said commissioners are hereby authorized to fix the form of such bids and to prescribe the amount that shall be deposited with each bid; and said commissioners may reject any and all bids received by them at any bidding and may readvertise for sale any lot or lots, or any construction thereon, to which said rejected bid or bids pertain. Any sale or sales aforesaid may be either for all cash, or payment may be made part in cash and the remainder in deferred payments secured by a deed or deeds of trust upon the property sold, as said commissioners may deem most advantageous to the District of Columbia; and in event of the sale of any lot or lots, said commissioners may in the name of the District of Columbia execute any and all such conveyances as may be necessary to convey a valid title to the purchaser. Pending the sale of any lot or lots, and of any constructions thereon, said commissioners shall manage the same as seems to them to the best interest of said District and to that end may lease the same upon such terms as to them seems proper, and may execute all such conveyances as may be necessary for that purpose. But each conveyance executed by said commissioners under authority of this section, whether of sale or of lease, shall embody all such covenants as may be necessary to impose upon the lot or lots, and upon any construction thereon, to which said conveyance relates, each and every restriction set forth in the petition on which such lot or lots, and the constructions thereon, were condemned, as such restrictions were varied, if at all, by the court before which the case was tried. All moneys payable on account of the sale, lease, or other disposition by said commissioners of any lot or lots, or of any construction thereon, shall be paid to the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia, and be by said collector deposited in the Treasury of the United States, one-half to the credit of the United States and one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 5. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed immediately after the passage of this act to proceed to prohibit the use as places of dwelling of all buildings situated in particular alleys, to be selected and designated by said commissioners, so as to displace annually from the alleys of said District persons residing therein equal in number to one-tenth of the number of persons dwelling in all the alleys of said District at the time of the passage of this act as determined by the most recent police census at that time, and so as to displace as many more of such persons as in the judgment of said commissioners can be displaced without overcrowding buildings elsewhere in said District.

SEC. 6. That before prohibiting the use as places of dwelling of the buildings situated in any alley in the District of Columbia, the Commissioners of said District shall notify every owner of real property in the square in which such alley is situated and every lessee of every building used for dwelling purposes in such alley of the intention of said commissioners so to do and shall in the notice thus given appoint a time and place when and where such owners and lessees will be heard by said commissioners and given an opportunity to show cause, if there be any, why the use of such buildings as places of dwelling should not be prohibited. And if at the time and place thus appointed, or at such subsequent time and other place as said commissioners may appoint, no such cause be shown, then said commissioners shall prohibit the use of such buildings as places of dwelling after the expiration of a period of time specified by said commissioners; but upon sufficient cause being shown to the satisfaction of said commissioners, said commissioners may postpone such prohibition of the use of said alley for dwelling purposes, but not so as to sanction its use for such purposes beyond the period named in section 1 of this act nor so as to reduce the rate of the depopulation of alleys below the rate specified in section 5 hereof.

SEC. 7. That if the Commissioners of the District of Columbia agree with the owner of any building used as a dwelling at the time of the passage of this act and the use of which as a dwelling is forbidden by said commissioners pursuant to the provisions of said act, as to the fact that said building is substantially depreciated in value by reason of such prohibition and as to the extent of such depreciation, said commissioners may in their discretion pay to said owner the amount thus determined and agreed upon from any appropriation that may be available for that purpose, and all further claim of said owner and of those who may thereafter hold under him shall cease and determine.

SEC. 8. That the owner or owners of any building in any alley in the District of Columbia, the use of which as a place of dwelling is prohibited under the provisions of this act, which said building was at the time of such prohibition used for dwelling purposes, and whose right to compensation has not been barred under section 7 of this act, may within six months from the date of the order of prohibition if he was in the first instance served personally with notice of the proposed issue of such order, and otherwise within one year, institute by petition proceedings in the Supreme Court of said District, sitting as a district court, against the District of Columbia, through the Commissioners of said District, for the determination of the damages, if any, to said building resulting from the prohibition of its further use as a dwelling and for the award of judgment against said District for the amount of such damage; and said court is hereby given full authority and power to hear and determine such causes and to issue such orders and decrees as may be necessary to that end and to enforce its orders and decrees with respect thereto, subject to such appeal as is authorized by law in similar causes. It shall be lawful for all or any part of the total number of owners of buildings used as dwellings in any alley the use of which as dwellings has been prohibited to unite in one proceeding under this section. If said commissioners are of opinion that the prohibition of the use of the buildings in said alley as a place of dwelling will materially enhance the value of certain real estate in said District so as to render such real property equitably liable to assessment because of such prohibition, said commissioners may, in their answer to the petition filed as hereinbefore authorized, pray that the owner or owners of such real estate believed to be so benefited be made codefendants with the District of Columbia to said cause, and said owner or owners shall be made codefendants accordingly.

Upon the filing of any answer by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia praying that the owner or owners of certain real estate in said District, named or otherwise sufficiently described in said answer, be made codefendant with said District in any proceedings instituted under the provisions of this act, the court shall cause such owner or owners and all other persons having any interest in the proceedings to be warned personally or by advertisement, as said court may determine, to attend court at a day to be named in said notice and to continue in attendance until the court makes its final order ratifying and confirming the award of damages and the assessment of benefits by the jury.

SEC. 9. That after the return of the marshal and the filing of proof of publication of the notice provided for in section 8, said court shall cause a jury of five judicious, disinterested men, not related to any person interested in the proceedings and not in the service or employment of the District of Columbia or of the United States, to be summoned by said marshal, to which jurors said court shall administer an oath or affirmation that they are not interested in any manner in any building the right to use which for dwelling purposes has been or is liable to be forbidden under the provisions of this act, nor in any way related to any of the parties to said proceeding, and that they will, without favor or partiality, to the best of their judgment, award the damage, if any, to which the owner of any building has been or will be subjected by reason of the prohibition of its use as a place of dwelling and assess the benefits that will result to owners of other real estate by reason of such prohibition. The court before accepting the jury shall hear any objections that may be made to any member thereof and shall have full power to decide upon all such objections, to excuse any juror, and to cause any vacancy in the jury, however such vacancy may occur, when impaneled, to be filled. And after the jury has been organized and has viewed the premises, said jury shall proceed to hear and receive such evidence as may be offered or submitted on behalf of any person or persons having an interest in the proceedings, and on behalf of the District of Columbia; but such hearings need not be in the presence of the court unless the court so direct, but may be in any room assigned to them by the United States marshal for said District, who, in person or by deputy, shall attend all such hearings. When the hearings are concluded, the jury, or a majority of them, shall in writing return to said court its verdict, awarding damages due and payable for loss sustained by the owner of any building a party to the proceeding by reason of the prohibiting of the use for dwelling purposes of the alley in which said building is located, if any damages be found and adjudged, and assessing benefits accruing and assessable on other real property by reason of such prohibition. Each juror shall receive $5 per day for his services during the time he is actually engaged under the provisions hereof.

SEC. 10. That the court shall have power to hear and determine any objections which may be filed to said verdict and to set aside or to locate the same in whole or in part, if satisfied that said verdict is unjust or unreasonable. If such verdict be set aside or vacated, in whole or in part, a new jury, having the qualifications hereinbefore mentioned, shall be summoned, who shall proceed to award damages and to assess the benefits, as the case may be, in respect to the real property as to which the verdict has been vacated, as in the case of the first jury: Provided, That the exceptions or objections to the verdict shall be filed within 30 days from the filing thereof: Provided further, That if the court is satisfied that part of the verdict should be set aside or vacated, then and in that event, at the election of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, the court shall set aside and vacate the entire verdict and a new jury shall be summoned in the case as aforesaid. If said commissioners do not elect that the entire verdict be set aside, and the same be set aside or vacated in part, the residue of the verdict shall not be affected thereby. The verdict of a new jury summoned in accordance with the provisions of this section shall be final; and if the amount of damages awarded by any new jury summoned be not greater, or if the assessments of benefits be not less, than the amount awarded or assessed by the jury first summoned, according as the objection to the verdict may have been to the award of damages or the assessment of benefits, the costs of the new jury shall be assessed against the property of the party or parties objecting; but if such party or parties prevail by the verdict of the new jury, either in increasing his or their award of damages or in diminishing his or their assessment for benefits, then and in that event the cost of the new jury shall be paid by the District of Columbia.

SEC. 11. That the jury shall award as damages such amount as the jury may find to represent the depreciation in the value of each and every premises arising out of the prohibition of the use of such premises as a place of dwelling, and shall assess as benefits only the actual increase in the value of any premises arising out of the prohibition of the use of any alley as a place of residence, as determined by the jury. And should the amount awarded as damages, plus the costs of the proceedings, including $5 a day for the marshal and for each juror when actually employed, exceed the amount assessed as benefits, the difference shall be chargeable to such appropriations and in such manner as Congress may from time to time direct: Provided, That when the verdict of the jury shall have been finally ratified and confirmed by the court, as herein provided, the amounts of money awarded as damages shall be paid to such owner or owners in the manner provided by law, out of any funds available therefor. And when the verdict of the jury has been finally ratified and confirmed by the court, as herein provided, the several assessments herein provided to be made shall severally be a lien upon the land against which they are assessed, and shall be collected as special improvement taxes in the District of Columbia. Such assessments shall be payable in four equal annual installments, with interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum from and after 60 days after the date of final confirmation of the verdict and until paid.

SEC. 12. That the court may allow amendments in form or in substance in any description of property affected or liable to be affected by any proceedings instituted under the provisions of sections 8 to 11, inclusive, of this act, whenever such amendments will not interfere with the substantial rights of the parties interested; and any such amendment may be made after, as well as before, the order or judgment confirming the verdict aforesaid.

SEC. 13. That no appeal from the decision of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia confirming any verdict of any jury appointed under the provisions of this act, nor any other proceeding at law or in equity against the confirmation of such verdict or against the confirmation of any part thereof, shall delay or prevent the payment of awards to others in respect to property damaged, nor operate to delay or prevent any criminal proceedings under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 14. That whenever the Commissioners of the District of Columbia prohibit the use of the buildings in any alley as places of dwelling, said commissioners shall notify of such prohibition the owners of all such buildings then used as places of dwelling in said alley and all lessees of such buildings, and said commissioners shall cause conspicuous signs to be displayed at prominent places in said alley, stating when the use of said buildings as places of dwelling must be discontinued. After the expiration of the period stated in the notices thus given and on the signs thus displayed no person shall occupy any building in said alley for dwelling purposes, nor shall any person having the power and authority to prevent permit any such building to be occupied for such purposes. No person shall, without the consent of the commissioners, deface, obliterate, remove, or conceal any sign displayed by said commissioners under authority of this act. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall be punished as provided in section 23 of this act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I notice that there are not 30 Members on the floor of the House, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Forty-four Members are present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 13219) to provide, in the interest of public health, comfort, morals, and safety, for the discontinuance of the use as dwellings of buildings situated in the alleys in the District of Columbia, finding itself without a quorum, he caused the roll to be called, whereupon 192 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees to be inserted in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will resume the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:
